In presenting this thesis or dissertation as a partial fulfillment of the requirements for an advanced degree from Emory University, I hereby grant to Emory University and its agents the non-exclusive license to archive, make accessible, and display my thesis or dissertation in whole or in part in all forms of media, now or hereafter known, including display on the world wide web. I understand that I may select some access restrictions as part of the online submission of this thesis or dissertation. I retain all ownership rights to the copyright of the thesis or dissertation. I also retain the right to use in future works (such as articles or books) all or part of this thesis or dissertation.

Signature:
Derek Olsen	Date

Reading Matthew with Monks:

Laying the Foundations for Conversation between Modern Biblical Scholarship and Early Medieval Monastic Interpretation

By

Derek A. Olsen Doctor of Philosophy

Graduate Division of Religion New Testament

Luke Timothy Johnson Advisor
Michael J. Brown
Committee Member
333333333
Charles D. Hackett
Committee Member
James Morey
Committee Member
Gail R. O'Day
Committee Member Accepted:
recepted.
Lisa A. Tedesco, Ph.D.
Dean of the Graduate School
Date
=

Reading Matthew with Monks:

Laying the Foundations for Conversation between Modern Biblical Scholarship and Early Medieval Monastic Interpretation

By

Derek A. Olsen B.A., St. Olaf College, 1996 M.Div., Candler School of Theology, 1999 S.T.M., Trinity Lutheran Seminary, 2000

Advisor: Luke Timothy Johnson, Ph.D.

An abstract of
A dissertation submitted to the Faculty of the James T. Laney School of Graduate Studies of Emory University in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the Graduate Division of Religion, New Testament
2011

Abstract

Reading Matthew with Monks:

Laying the Foundations for Conversation between Modern Biblical Scholarship and Early Medieval Monastic Interpretation

By Derek A. Olsen

In this study, I lay the foundations for a conversation between the modern academic study of the Bible and early medieval monastic reading strategies. From a cultural perspective, I examine the similarities and differences between the modern academic reading culture and the culture of early medieval monastics with a particular focus on the English 10th Century Benedictine Revival and its chief catechist, Ælfric of Eynsham. Three major points of contact—the use of mimetic processes of formation, the literary focus of the communities, and the awareness of participating within a critical conversation—are examined from primary and secondary sources to uncover both the methods and purposes of each culture's reading strategies. Assessing these points enables the reading process of the medieval monastics to be seen on their own terms rather than from a strictly modern perspective. Next, a discussion of the distinctive factor of early medieval monastic culture, the liturgical shape of communal life, provides a central context for understanding monastic homilies.

Once the backgrounds and strategies have been discussed in the abstract, I examine the particularities of the reading strategies in relation to four Matthean passages: Matt 4:1-11, 5:1-12, 8:1-13, and 25:1-13. I place the work of four major modern scholars, Ulrich Luz, W. D. Davies and Dale Allison, M. Eugene Boring, and Douglas Hare, in relation to homilies on these passages by Ælfric of Eynsham as considered in their liturgical settings.

Reading Matthew with Monks:

Laying the Foundations for Conversation between Modern Biblical Scholarship and Early Medieval Monastic Interpretation

By Derek A. Olsen B.A., St. Olaf College, 1996 M.Div., Candler School of Theology, 1999 S.T.M., Trinity Lutheran Seminary, 2000

Advisor: Luke Timothy Johnson, Ph.D.

A dissertation submitted to the Faculty of the James T. Laney School of Graduate Studies of Emory University in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the Graduate Division of Religion, New Testament 2011

Acknowledgements

I could never begin to thank all of the people who have assisted me in making this dissertation possible. There have been, over the years, countless people who have supported this work intellectually, emotionally, spiritually, and financially—to all of you I owe my deepest gratitude. Special acknowledgment goes to my long-suffering and beloved wife, Meredith Kefauver Olsen, and our wonderful daughters, Greta and Hannah, who sacrificed the most; to my advisor and mentor, Luke Timothy Johnson without whom this never would have gotten off the ground, let alone completed; and to the congregations and clergy of St. Mary the Virgin, Times Square, and the Cathedral of St Phillip, Atlanta who stood by us and gave us strength in the darkest hours.

Dedication

Fidelium animae per misericordiam Dei requiescant in pace

Reading Matthew with Monks:

Laying the Foundations for Conversation between Modern Biblical Scholarship and Early Medieval Monastic Interpretation

Contents

Table of Abbreviations	ix
Table of Figures	X1
Chapter 1	1
Conversations and Criticisms
Introduction
A Multiplicity of Voices
Criteria for Conversations
The Early Medieval Monastic Micro-Culture	7
Applying the Criteria
Naming the Prejudices: Biblical Scholarship's Assessment of the E
Positive Assessments of Early Medieval Monastic Reading	21
Building a Conversation
Selecting Texts	28
Selecting Conversation Partners	30
The Aim of the Conversation
The Shape of the Conversation	32
Chapter 2	34
Introduction	34
Mimetic Cultures	35
The Scientific Study of the NT	35
Mimesis in Early Medieval Monastic Culture
Summary
Literary Cultures
The Hermeneutical Framework
The Critical Conversation	74
The Modern Situation	74
The Early Medieval Situation	83
Summary	98
Chapter 3	100
Introduction	100
Liturgical Interpretation	101
The Three Kinds of Liturgical Services
The Daily Office	104
The Mass
The Chapter	111
The Monastic Day-Cycle
Scripture and The Church Year
Secondary Occasions of the Season

Summary	129
Chapter 4	131
Matthew 4:1-11	132
Introduction	132
Modern Interpreters	133
Ælfric's Interpretation	142
Discussion	163
Matthew 5:1–12	167
Introduction	167
Modern Interpreters	168
Ælfric's Interpretation	182
Discussion	196
Chapter 5	200
Matthew 8:1–13	200
Introduction	200
Modern Interpreters	201
Ælfric's Interpretation	215
Discussion	231
Matthew 25:1–13	236
Introduction	236
Modern Interpreters	236
Ælfric's Interpretation	249
Discussion	262
Chapter 6	266
Appendix	271
Catholic Homily I, 11: 1st Sunday In Lent (Matt 4:1-11)	271
Catholic Homily I, 36: Feast of All Saints (Matt 5:1-12)	279
Catholic Homily I, 8: 3rd Sunday after Epiphany (Matt 8:1-13)	289
Catholic Homily II, 39: For Plural Virgins (Matt 25:1-13)	296
Bibliography	303

Table of Abbreviations

ÆCHom I (Pref) ¹	Preface to the first cycle of Ælfric's Catholic Homilies as edited in Peter Clemoes, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text, (EETS s.s. 17; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 174-7.
ÆCHom I, 1	Homily De initio creaturae in the first cycle of Ælfric's Catholic Homilies as edited in Peter Clemoes, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text , (EETS s.s. 17; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 178-89.
ÆCHom I, 11	Homily for the 1 st Sunday in Lent in the first cycle of Ælfric's Catholic Homilies as edited in Peter Clemoes, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text, (EETS s.s. 17; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 266-74.
ÆCHom I, 36	Homily for the Feast of All Saints in the first cycle of Ælfric's Catholic Homilies as edited in Peter Clemoes, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text, (EETS s.s. 17; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 486-96.
ÆCHom I, 8	Homily for the 3 rd Sunday after Epiphany in the first cycle of Ælfric's Catholic Homilies as edited in Peter Clemoes, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text, (EETS s.s. 17; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 241-8.
ÆCHom I, 8 (App)	Appendix to the homily for the 3 rd Sunday after Epiphany in the first cycle of Ælfric's Catholic Homilies as edited in Peter Clemoes, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text, (EETS s.s. 17; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 553.
ÆCHom II, 44	Homily for the Common of Virgins in the second cycle of Ælfric's Catholic Homilies as edited in Malcolm Godden, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The Second Series, Text, (EETS s.s. 5; London: Oxford University Press, 1979), 327-34.
ÆHex	Ælfric's Hexameron as edited in Samuel J. Crawford, Exameron Anglice or The Old English Hexameron, (Bib. ags. Prosa 10; Hamburg: H. Grand, 1921 [repr. Darmstadt 1968]), 33-74.
ÆHom 12	Ælfric's sermon De sancta Trinitate et de festis diebus per annum as edited in; John C. Pope, Homilies of Ælfric: A Supplementary Collection , 2 vols., (EETS 259, 260; London: Oxford University Press, 1967-8), 1.463-72.
ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB)	Ælfric's Letter to Sigweard as edited in Samuel J. Crawford, The Old English Version of the Heptateuch , (EETS 160; London: Oxford University Press, 1922; repr. with additions by N.R. Ker 1969),

¹ These and all other titles of Old English texts follow the standards established by the Dictionary of Old English which can be found online at: http://www.doe.utoronto.ca/st/index.html (Accessed 3/13/09).

18-33, 39-51.

Ælfric's Letter to Wulfgeat as edited in Bruno Assmann, ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) Angelsächsische Homilien und Heiligenleben, (Bib. ags. Prosa 3; Darmstadt 1964), 1-12.

Kassel: G. H. Wigand, 1889; repr. with intro. by P. Clemoes

Sermon on the Memory of the Saints in Ælfric's Lives of the ÆLS (Memory of Saints)

Saints edited in Walter W. Skeat, Ælfric's Lives of Saints, 4 vols., (EETS 76, 82, 94, 114; London: Oxford University Press, 1881-1900 [repr. in 2 vols. 1966]), 1. 336-62.

René-Jean Hesbert, Corpus Antiphonalium Officii. 6 vols. (Rome:

Herder, 1963ff)

CAO

Ælfric's Letter to the Monks at Eynsham as edited in LME

Christopher A. Jones, Ælfric's Letter to the Monks at Eynsham

(Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998).

Jean-Paul Migne, ed., Patrologia Latina, (Paris 1844-1855), with PL

supplementary volumes

Rule of St Benedict as edited in Timothy Fry, ed., et al., RB RB

1980: The Rule of Saint Benedict in Latin and English with Notes

(Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Training, 1981)

Regularis Concordia as edited in Thomas Symons, Regularis RC

Concordia Anglicae Nationis Monachorum Sanctimonialiumque. The Monastic Agreement of the Monks and Nuns of the English Nation.

(London: Nelson, 1953)

Table of Figures

Table 1: Monastic Festal Night Office	107
Table 2: Monastic Festal Lauds and Vespers
Table 3: Monastic Little Offices
Table 4: Static and Variable Elements of the Mass	110
Table 5: The Monastic Chapter	111
Table 6: The Monastic Day according to the Regularis Concordia

Chapter 1

CONVERSATIONS AND CRITICISMS

Introduction

In this study, I lay the foundations for a conversation between the modern academic study of the Bible and early medieval monastic reading strategies. After illuminating the similarities and differences between these two distinct reading cultures, I place interpretations from four modern academic interpreters of Matthew's gospel and an early medieval monastic abbot together to make initial steps towards what the modern project can learn from the early medieval. Since the rise of the scientific study of the Scriptures, premodern interpretive methods have been regarded with a certain amount of suspicion by the academic community—sometimes justly, sometimes less so. In order to achieve a higher level of clarity, I explore both modern academic and early medieval monastic exegesis as products of distinct micro-cultures. Coming from this perspective, I hope to avoid judgments and preconceptions that prevent the early medieval project from being seen on its own terms and will focus on the monastic liturgy as the central locus of this culture's exegetical efforts.² Once this foundation has been laid, I place the sermons of Ælfric of Eynsham, a 10th/11th century English Benedictine abbot into conversation with the works of four major modern Matthean commentaries to assess his suitability as a conversation partner.

A Multiplicity of Voices

In the last forty years Reader-Response and Cultural Criticism, methods once considered by many to be on the fringe of academic discourse, have found their way into the main body of the scientific study of the New Testament. Manuals devoted to methods reveal the shift. The authoritative collection The New Testament and its Modern Interpreters,³ published in 1989, devotes part 2 to "Methods of New Testament Scholarship" and includes major headings for Textual Criticism, Philology, Form and Redaction Criticism, and Recent Literary Criticism. Textual criticism receives twice the space allotted for the others.⁴ The last section on Recent Literary Criticism discusses the "new hermeneutic" and the beginnings of post-structuralism in biblical studies. But neither reader-response nor cultural methods make the cut. A contemporary work from 1987 introducing exegesis to students, Biblical Exegesis: A Beginner's Handbook,⁵ likewise moves as far as Structuralist and Canonical Criticism, but does not venture into the new territory.

 $^{^2}$ While the focus of my work is a 10^{th} century author, and the 10^{th} century is the latest possible point that can fall under the category "early medieval," I use it because the reading methods described here are in continuity with earlier practice rather than Scholastic methods of later periods.

Twenty years later, the second edition of Hayes and Holladay's Biblical Exegesis contains a new chapter: "Exegesis with a Special Focus: Cultural, Economic, Ethnic, Gender, and Sexual Perspectives." The subheadings include Liberation Theology, Feminist Interpretation, Postcolonial Interpretation, African and African-American Interpretation, and Queer Commentary. Similarly, Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation (1995) offers three chapters: "The Reader in New Testament Interpretation," "Global Perspectives on New Testament Interpretation," and "Feminist Hermeneutics." Another popular introductory work, To Each Its Own Meaning: Biblical Criticisms and their Applications orients beginners by grouping methods into three general categories: Traditional Methods of Biblical Criticism, Expanding the Tradition, and Overturning the Tradition. The last category includes three significant chapters: "Reader-Response Criticism," "Reading the Bible

³ Eldon J. Epp and George W. MacRae, S.J. eds., The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters (Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1989).

⁴ Part 2 appears from pp. 75-189; textual criticism receives 51 pages, philology 21, form and redaction 25, and recent literary criticism 23.

⁵ John H. Hayes and Carl R. Holladay, Biblical Exegesis: A Beginner's Handbook (Revised ed.; Atlanta, GA: John Knox, 1987).

⁶ John H. Hayes and Carl R. Holladay, Biblical Exegesis: A Beginner's Handbook (2nd ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2007), 167-177.

⁷ Joel B. Green, ed., Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation (Grand Rapids, Mich: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1995)

⁸ Steven L. McKenzie and Stephen R. Haynes, eds., To Each Its Own Meaning: Biblical Criticisms and their Applications (Revised ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999).

Ideologically: Feminist Criticism," and "Reading the Bible Ideologically: Socioeconomic Criticism."

Reader-response criticism continues the initiative taken by New Criticism within biblical studies. While classical historical-critical methods privileged authorial intent, New Criticism invested the text with its own authority; the text apart from its author was the locus of meaning. Reader-response goes a step farther and suggests that meaning is not simply found, rather, it is created through an encounter between text and reader. While a variety of theories fall under the rubric of "reader-response," Stanley Fish's represents a particularly useful version, because he highlights the importance of interpretive contexts, locating meaning-making preeminently within communities of interpretation: "meanings are the property neither of fixed and stable texts nor of free and independent readers but of interpretive communities that are responsible both for the shape of a reader's activities and for the texts those activities produce." Individual readings, therefore, are neither produced nor evaluated in isolation but in accord with the rules and rubrics of the communities in which they are produced.

From the perspective of Fish's work, cultural criticism is the logical and necessary next step. It begins by questioning the basic assumption of interpretive objectivity long-held by the academy. Rather than the academy being regarded as the exclusive location where objective truth is sought and found, it appears as one interpretive community among others. A highly informed, highly dedicated community to be sure, but not the sole arbiter of authentic readings of the New Testament. There is now a greater appreciation for the conviction that, if interpretive contexts and communities are the primary locus for meaning-making activities, then norms and the meanings produced from the text within these norms deserve to be taken seriously even if the norms are not those of the academy.

) 1

⁹ Vanhoozer draws a distinction between conservative and radical reader-response methods, differentiated the two groups by the relative weight they assign to the text; his conservative group acknowledges the existence of meanings in texts apart from the their readers, while the radicals—exemplified by Richard Rorty—place most if not all authority for the meaning-making process into the hands of the reader. (Kevin J. Vanhoozer, "The Reader in New Testament Interpretation," in Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation, edited by Joel B. Green, (Grand Rapids, Mich: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1995), 301-328, 306-312.

¹⁰ Stanley E. Fish. Is There a Text in This Class?: The Authority of Interpretive Communities, (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1980), 322.

In recent decades, then, biblical scholarship has been enriched by a growing plurality of voices representing interpretive communities from around the globe. While African, African-American, Latino, feminist, womanist, queer, and liberation perspectives have challenged the more traditional academic approaches, these challenges and critiques have not always taken the form of condemnations. Strong advocates of the new readings insist that they neither displace nor replace one another. Brian Blount in the conclusion to his ground-breaking Cultural Interpretation states:

The biblical text harbors a vast potential of meaning. A researcher's questions codetermine his or her final conclusions regarding which segment of that potential meaning to access. It is not necessarily the case that a new meaning is placed in the text, but that meaning may be interpersonally and therefore contextually extracted from it. For this reason we come to the conclusion that the fullest possible meaning can be achieved only by drawing from the variety of interpretations, not understanding them as alternatives, but as providing a complementary range of meanings. Encouraged by Enrique Dussel, we conclude that an analectical engagement that precipitates a recognition and appreciation for the different kinds of sociolinguistically determined evaluations can push us beyond the boundaries that attempt to place limits on the possibilities for text meaning. 11

The questions that researchers bring to any text inevitably shape what they find in the text. Questions, in turn, are both personally and culturally conditioned by interpretive contexts and communities. However, personal particularity—perhaps even cultural particularity—may be transcended through reflective engagement with complementary readings and the meanings they uncover.

¹¹ Brian K. Blount, Cultural Interpretation: Reorienting New Testament Criticism (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995), 176. My later use of the terms "macro-cultural" and "micro-cultural" were inspired by Blount's analysis.

This conviction expressed by Blount and affirmed by others commends to biblical scholars within the academy the benefits of cultivating conversations with readers outside their specific cultural context. Seriously engaging complementary meanings derived from different root questions can push them beyond the boundaries that their methods place upon them, and can enable them to access possibilities for text meaning formerly not appreciated.

If members of the academy do the hard work of engaging in conversation with voices from alternate interpretive contexts and communities, are there some conversations that will prove more fruitful than others? Are there some conversation partners who may be exceptionally suitable for the task at hand? Rather than heading down the tendentious—and possibly pernicious—road of identifying less fruitful or unfruitful partners, I propose specific criteria for what could create bountiful conversations, where the implications of reader-response and cultural criticisms can assist and further the intellectual efforts of the modern American academic reading community.

Criteria for Conversations

The first criterion must be commitment to the text. For New Testament scholarship to enter into dialogue about the New Testament with another voice, that other voice must itself represent a community that reads the New Testament regularly and with recognizable and non-arbitrary interpretive methods. It must be committed to engaging the New Testament even if it does not do so from an academic perspective. Without such commitment on both sides, the conversation will inevitably falter or find only marginal application.

The second criterion is that the voice engaged should be truly other from the voice of the modern academy. The academy is itself a micro-culture existing within, yet with American environment, the academy is a micro-culture composed of the educated who have dedicated significant time and resources to mastering a body of knowledge including the New Testament and the largely white European Protestant moneyed heterosexual male paradigms for interpreting it that have defined the field from its emergence in the Enlightenment to the present. A voice that is other is a voice that in some significant way challenges one or more of the micro-cultural characteristics stated here—or one of the myriad others not mentioned

A third criterion, perhaps paradoxical in light of the second, is that there be distinct points of contact between the other voice and the academy. While foreignness is essential for the voice to present a true challenge, radical otherness may not produce enough common ground to sustain a substantive conversation. Some shared characteristics or qualities are necessary for contact. Examples might include sharing the same macro-culture or sharing micro-cultural similarities.

A fourth criterion is breadth of scope. The more information that we have from a particular voice, the more valuable it is. Information on New Testament works is essential; attention to particular passages is helpful; general reflections on the art of interpretation, a desirable bonus. That is, a voice that both articulates its hermeneutical principles and puts them into action is easier to engage than one without such broader reflection.

A fifth criterion—perhaps not necessary but certainly desirable—is an interest in cross-cultural communication. Understanding people, thoughts, and concepts within one's own micro-culture can be difficult enough; understanding an alien perspective is certainly helped by being met half-way. An awareness of the difficulties of cross-cultural communication and a commitment to communicating insights from one micro- or macroculture to another certainly assists the process.

-

¹² The terms "macro-culture" and "micro-culture" are sociological terms relating respectively to national, racial or ethnic groupings and distinct local or organizational cultures that participate within the larger culture but form distinctive groups within it.

One final factor necessary for a genuine conversation to exist has not to do with the other voice but with the character of the conversation itself. The inevitable human reaction to what is strange is prejudice. Before beginning the conversation, academic interlocutors should name the prejudices and assumptions they hold and commit themselves to understanding the other as fully as possible on its own terms. The point of a conversation is not to embrace the methods or results of the other uncritically (for that is a betrayal of one's own side of the conversation) but to attempt to understand the other's perspective, the norms of the other's interpretive community, and the questions driving the other's reading.

Much of the fruitful work in conversation with other cultures has occurred across ethnic and socioeconomic lines. Primarily, though, the voices heard in such conversations have been contemporary ones. In the present project, I lay the foundations for a conversation that is historical. I make the preliminary introductions in order to begin a conversation between interpreters of the modern American academic micro-culture and an interpreter from the early medieval monastic micro-culture.

The Early Medieval Monastic Micro-Culture

In looking for conversation partners, the early medieval monastic micro-culture stands out because of its steadfast dedication to Scripture. The goal of monastic life was to conform as perfectly as possible to the life commanded by Scripture. In particular, it attempted to exemplify the New Testament command to be formed into the mind of Christ through obedience to the commands in the gospels and imitation of the Christ found there. For monastics, this quest was not occasional or seasonal, but formed the bedrock of their very existence. Monastic life was preeminently the embodiment of the Gospel discipline.

To speak of anything "monastic," however, is to speak with the broadest of strokes. Christian monasticism as a movement spans some seventeen centuries, is found on all inhabited continents, and takes a wide range of forms under a multitude of rules distributed throughout Protestant, Catholic, and Orthodox Christianity. Tremendous variation has existed throughout these various times and places. Rather than speak in generalities, I focus here on one particular monastic author from an identifiable time and place with a sizeable and representative corpus of interpretation to draw from: Ælfric of Eynsham, monk, masspriest, and sometime abbot of Eynsham, who flourished around the end of the first millennium.¹³

Since postmodernism has raised academic discussions of objectivity and subjectivity, some modern scholars especially those with faith commitments have begun discussing the difference between academic reading strategies and ecclesially-shaped readings, readings that begin from a premise of faith, are often guided by doctrinal commitments, and are intended for communities of faith. There is no question that the monastic readers under discussion here are doing ecclesially-shaped readings; however, the ecclesial shape alone is not the most significant aspect of these readings. The Benedictine life lived at the end of the early medieval period is a distinctive culture in its own right: a religious culture, a literary culture, that sought to form itself around Scripture particularly Scripture enacted liturgically in a way not seen within Western Christianity before or after. It is ecclesially shaped, but its significance extends far beyond this single factor.

Within the monastic milieu, Ælfric occupies a unique position. He inhabited this Benedictine culture thoroughly and, more than that, chronicled its methods and hermeneutics to a degree virtually unparalleled. The difference between Ælfric and other possible authors—Hrabanus Maurus comes to mind—is Ælfric's deep drive to communicate his way of life intertwined with his way of reading to the larger world. Hrabanus Maurus's vast corpus is in Latin; written by a monk, for monks. Ælfric's work, with a few exceptions, was in Old English; written by a monk, but for the edification of an entire nation.

¹³ As a result of my historical focus, verbs relating to monastics will be in the past tense. Let the reader not forget that for thousands of monastics around the world many of the disciplines and methods described are not historical but present practice.

After centuries of Viking attacks, ecclesial life in 10th century Anglo-Saxon England received a boost from the Benedictine Revival, a cultural movement spearheaded by three monastic bishops—Dunstan, Archbishop of Canterbury; Æthelwold, Bishop of Winchester; and Oswald, Bishop of Worcester—who sought to restore national culture through a renewal of English monastic houses. Following the Continental reforms of Benedict of Aniane, an 8th century Frankish reformer, they championed a strict Benedictine monasticism that emphasized fidelity to the Rule of Benedict. The vast majority of Anglo-Saxon materials extant are the products of the scriptoria from houses founded by these reformers.

The greatest figure of the second generation of the Benedictine Revival is Ælfric of Eynsham. The scarce biographical data that survives is gleaned from his own writings. ¹⁴ He entered the Old Minster at Winchester under Æthelwold around 970 and was a priest at Cernel in 987. He became abbot of the monastery at Eynsham in 1005 and probably died around 1010.

Ælfric's particular contribution to the Revival was a vast literary production aimed, not at the intellectual giants of the day, but at the literate nobles¹⁵ who served as his patrons, the semi-literate monastic and secular clergy of the day, and their parishioners. Eschewing Latin for all but his most erudite works, Ælfric wrote in the Old English vernacular in a rhythmic alliterative prose style, reminiscent of the vernacular poetic tradition. He is consitently hailed as one of the the greatest vernacular stylist of the Anglo-Saxon period by modern scholars.¹⁷ Indeed, the survival of his corpus is due not to the intellectual novelty of his works but rather their stylistic excellence.

¹⁴ In particular his preface to his translation of Genesis and the prefaces to the two cycles of Catholic Homilies contain limited autobiographical material.

¹⁵ The ealdorman Æthelweard, for instance, could not only read and write his native tongue but also wrote a Latin chronicle that has survived to the present.

¹⁶ See D.R. Letson, "The Poetic Content of the Revival Homily," in The Old English Homily & its Backgrounds (ed. Paul E. Szarmach and Bernard F. Huppé; Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1978), 139-56, 151.

When compared to other figures of his age, the scope of his writings is enormous. Angus Cameron, in preparation for the Dictionary of the Old English Corpus, ¹⁸ identified 203 discrete pieces written by Ælfric in Old English, ranging from brief notes ¹⁹ to lengthy treatises. Of these, 166 are homilies/sermons, ²⁰ homiletical materials, ²¹ or substantive additions to sermons. The bulk of these are gathered into two cycles that follow the Church Year—the Catholic Homilies, series 1 (CH 1) and series 2 (CH 2)—which contain forty items each. Another identifiable corpus is the Lives of the Saints, which also—according to Ælfric's preface—contains forty items. ²² These three collections were written relatively early in Ælfric's career while he was a simple monk and mass-priest at Cerne Abbey. ²³ The rest of the sermons were written throughout Ælfric's career as he re-envisioned his project from a set of cycles to a single complete Temporale cycle. ²⁴

¹⁷ See R. D. Fulk and Christopher M. Cain, A History of Old English Literature (Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2005), 80-1; Janet Bately, "The Nature of Old English Prose," in The Cambridge Companion to Old English Literature (ed. Malcolm Godden and Michael Lapidge; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); Paul Szarmach, "Anglo-Saxon Letters in the Eleventh Century," in The Eleventh Century (ed. Stanley Ferber and Sandro Sticca; Acta 1; Binghamton, NY: CEMERS, 1974), 1-14, 6; Peter A.M. Clemoes, "Late Old English Literature," in Tenth Century Studies: Essays in Commemoration of the Millennium of the Council of Winchester and the Regularis Concordia (ed. David Parsons; London: Phillimore, 1975), 103-114, 109; Milton McC. Gatch, Preaching and Theology in Anglo-Saxon England: Ælfric and Wulfstan (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1977), 12.

18 For the complete list see Angus Cameron, "A List of Old English Texts," in A Plan for the Dictionary of Old English (ed. Roberta Frank and Angus Cameron; Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1973), 25-306, 44-88.

19 For instance, b1.1.16 and b1.2.17 are single sentences appended to the ends of homilies stating the inappropriateness of preaching on Good Friday and Holy Saturday.

²⁰ The distinction between sermons and homilies differs between periods and in the usage of authors, ancient and modern. Benjamin Thorpe, the first modern editor and translator [1846-8] of Ælfric's Sermones Catholici opted to title his work Homilies of the Anglo-Saxon Church and refers to the two cycles as the Catholic Homilies, the name that has been adopted as the norm. While Ælfric seemed to consider his works to be sermons, I shall follow the modern convention of referring to these cycles as the Catholic Homilies (CH).

²¹ The 34 items contained in the Lives of the Saints are in the form of sermons, but Ælfric clearly intends them for devotional reading rather than public proclamation. Nevertheless, the manuscript tradition suggests that they were probably used for both purposes.

²² Displaying a difference between medieval and modern numbering conventions—and the capriciousness of scribes in a manuscript culture—Cameron identifies 34 discrete items in the LS apart from the Preface (See Cameron, "A Plan," 70-76).

²³ ÆCHom I (Pref) ll. 44-47. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 176.

²⁴ This term will be explained later when we discus the monastic liturgical calendar.

The 39 non-homiletic materials in Ælfric's Old English writings and a small number of Latin works not accounted for in Cameron's list²⁵ consist of a variety of texts from a grammar, to Old Testament translations, to the earliest introduction to the Scriptures in English, to treatises on doctrinal topics. Ælfric did not simply write or translate at random. He was working toward a particular end. If the monastic bishops attempted to restore English culture by promoting rigorous monastic practice, Ælfric sought to restore it by giving the clergy, both monastic and secular, ²⁶ access to comprehensive catechetical texts in their native language in order for them to more perfectly nurture their congregants. In addition to being the greatest prose stylist, Ælfric was, without a doubt, the greatest Christian educator of his age. He took great pains to present the intellectual and theological treasures of the church to both clergy and laity as clearly and directly as possible. He was constantly attentive to the risk of heresy²⁷ on one hand and the danger of knowledge without adequate formation on the other.²⁸

Because of the ecclesial circumstances of the Benedictine Revival and the survival of Ælfric's corpus, he becomes an ideal object for study on the microhistorical level. Rather than speaking in generalities gleaned from various authors separated by centuries and vast distances, Ælfric's situation allows us to engage him as a discrete author working within an identifiable embodied community whose educational and liturgical practices can be accurately described even if they are not entirely recoverable.

²⁵ The chief Latin items positively identified as genuine include a life of St. Æthelwold, the Letter to the Monks at Eynsham (LME)—a monastic customary, and some pastoral letters to other clergy.

²⁶ While the reformers would have preferred for all clergy to be monks, this was impractical as well as impossible. Thus, a distinction is made in the writings of the period between the monastic and secular—non-monastic—clergy. For a useful discussion of the interaction between monastic establishments, minsters, and the secular priesthood, see Karen Jolly's sociological study of clerical dynamics, Popular Religion in Late Saxon England: Elf Charms in Context (Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1996).

²⁷ In his preface to CH I Ælfric states that he translates these sermons, "Because I saw and heard great heresies in many English books which unlearned men in their innocence took to be great wisdom" (ÆCHom I (Pref) ll. 50-52; Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 174).

²⁸ Often throughout the homilies, Ælfric will allude to a deeper meaning of a particular text, but states that he chooses not to present the interpretation as it would be unedifying to the unlearned. See ÆCHom I, 36 ll.282-288; ÆCHom II, 34 ll.1-6 See also ÆCHom I, 12 ll.122-126; ÆCHom I, 24 ll.109-113.

Applying the Criteria

Having proposed five criteria to assess a suitable conversation partner, I now apply them to Ælfric and the early medieval monastic micro-culture. I draw upon Ælfric's own works, as well as the main stream of Western monasticism located chiefly in the Rule of Benedict and the writings of John Cassian.

The first criterion is serious engagement with the New Testament text. Monastic life was an attempt to embody the commands of Scripture as completely as possible and this emphasis appears through monastic writings. The alphabetical collection of the Apothegmata Patrum, records a saying of Antony the Great (†ca. 356)—considered the founder of monasticism:

Someone asked Abba Antony, "What must one do in order to please God?" The old man replied, "Pay attention to what I tell you: whoever you may be, always have God before your eyes; whatever you do, do it according to the testimony of the Holy Scriptures; in whatever place you live, do not easily leave it. Keep these three precepts and you will be saved."²⁹

Whether this was spoken by Antony or not is immaterial, for this counsel is reiterated countless times in countless ways through monastic literature: from the Institutes and Conferences of John Cassian, through the eponymous Rule of Benedict of Nursia, through the Commentary on the Rule of Benedict and the Diadem of Monks by Smaragdus of Saint-Mihel.

The Rule of Benedict concludes by directing its readers away from itself and toward Scripture and the interpretations of it by the Church Fathers:

For anyone hastening on to the perfection of monastic life, there are the teachings of the holy Fathers, the observance of which will lead him to the very heights of perfection. What page, what passage of the books of the Old and New Testaments is not the truest guides for human life? What book of the holy catholic Fathers does not resoundingly summon us along the true way to reach the Creator?³⁰

²⁹ Benedicta Ward, trans., The Sayings of the Desert Fathers: The Alphabetical Collection (Cistercian Studies 59, Revised ed., Kalamazoo: Cistercian, 1984), 2.

This general statement is given concrete expression in chapter four, the longest chapter of the Rule. Entitled "The Tools for Good Works," it is a dizzying deployment of scriptural and scriptural-based commands that begins with Jesus' summary of the Law³¹ and moves through seventy-four commands focusing on behavior and monastic decorum.

The context in which these seventy-four commands are to be lived out, according to Benedict, is balanced between three fundamental activities: liturgical prayer consisting primarily of scriptural materials, especially the Psalms; holy reading which consists of reading, meditating upon, and memorizing Scripture and the catholic Fathers; and manual labor. The first two are explicitly focused upon the Scriptures; monastic sources indicate that the third is as well. John Cassian defines the goal of sacred reading as gaining the ability for constant mediation on the Scriptures whether reading or not: "Hence the successive books of Holy Scripture must be diligently committed to memory and ceaselessly reviewed." For the monastic who has memorized large swathes of Scripture which is recalled during manual labor, the activities of daily work are just as much a potential location for insights into Holy Scripture as reading in the monastic cell.

The second criterion is difference. While Ælfric participates within many of the same categories as the majority of interpreters informing the academy—he is a white European Christian male—his 10th century Anglo-Saxon macro-culture is entirely different. Ælfric lived within a completely different world-view where the incessant Viking raids afflicting England are considered as the immediate harbinger of the Antichrist.³³ His micro-culure was also quite different; his interpretive strategies and purposes are not those of the modern academy and the dominant historical-critical paradigm. Specific differences will be discussed in detail throughout my study.

³⁰ RB 73.3-4. Timothy Fry, ed., et al., RB 1980: The Rule of Saint Benedict in Latin and English with Notes (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Training, 1981), 295, 297. All citations from the Rule will come from this edition, henceforth RB 1980.

³¹ RB 4.1-2. Fry, RB 1980, 181.

³² John Cassian, Conf. 14.10.4. Boniface Ramsey, trans., John Cassian: The Conferences (Ancient Christian Writers 57; Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist, 1997), 514. All citations from the Conferences will come from this edition unless otherwise indicated, henceforth Conferences.

The third criterion is points of contact. Despite the many and very real differences between Ælfric and modern interpreters, there are a number of significant parallels between early medieval monastic culture and modern academic culture which will be ennumerated in the course of chapter 2. On the most basic level, however, both Ælfric and the modern interpreters choose a reasoned written discourse³⁴ as the primary means for spreading their insights into the Scriptures, producing texts that can be analyzed and compared with one another.

The fourth criterion is breadth of scope. In this respect, Ælfric is ideal. While we do have collections of materials from various authors in the early medieval period, rarely is there such a broad and coherent body of materials as we have from Ælfric. He is the author of the first introduction to the Bible in English³⁵ and a number of catechetical treatises³⁶ which give us a clear sense of how he conceptualized the Christian faith and the place of the New Testament within it. Between the Catholic Homilies and the supplemental homilies Ælfric wrote later in life, he wrote exegetical works on over 150 distinct New Testament pericopes, the majority being Gospel passages, with occasional Epistle texts included as well. Furthermore, he produced a Latin customary, a document that describes precisely how a monastic rule will be interpreted and kept within his abbey. It gives important details on how

³³ See the Old English preface to CH I.

³⁴ While Ælfric's primary literary form is the sermon and orality is clearly an important aspect of preaching, Ælfric consciously wrote and maintained a written body of sermons that could be used by the clergy who could not (or possibly should not, in his opinion) produce their own. His Latin prefaces to the Catholic Homilies clearly indicate that he hoped his sermons would be copied and circulated to ensure orthodox preaching in England.

³⁵ The Letter to Sigeweard. This text will be discussed in more detail in chapter 2.

³⁶ In addition to the aforementioned Letter to Sigeweard, the Letter to Wulfgeat, the Hexameron, ÆCHom I, 1, ÆHom 12, and ÆLS (Memory of Saints) have a primarily catechetical function.

Ælfric expected monastic life to function, and documents the environment he created for himself and his fellow monastics.

The fifth criterion is a cross-cultural approach. Here, Ælfric once again proves ideal. While he certainly did not write in order to engage later academics, Ælfric very much understood his overall catechetical program in cross-cultural terms. He was attempting to transmit the learned knowledge of the early medieval monastic micro-culture to broader Anglo-Saxon culture, to those who lacked both the leisure and the capacity to access truth from the Latin texts of Scripture and earlier Latin interpretation of Scripture. Indeed, this is the stated purpose of his Catholic Homilies:

Then it came to my mind, I believe through God's gift, that I should turn this book from the Latin tongue into the English language, not through boldness on account of great learning, but because I saw and heard great heresies in many English books that unlearned men through their ignorance thought to be great wisdom. And it saddened me that they did not have the gospel lore in their writing except only the men who knew Latin and except for the books that we have that King Alfred wisely turned from Latin into English.³⁷

In addition to his homilies, Ælfric's catechetical letters and biblical paraphrases, prepared for literate nobles, testify to a desire to communicate outside of his micro-culture and to share his grasp of Christian doctrine and biblical teaching with the wider culture. This very drive to communicate makes Ælfric an ideal ambassador from his culture to ours.

Naming the Prejudices: Biblical Scholarship's Assessment of the Early Medieval Period

_

³⁷ Pa bearn me on mode ic truwige ðurh godes gife. Þæt ic ðas boc of ledenum gereorde to engliscre spræce awende. na þurh gebylde micelre lare. ac for ðan ðe ic geseah & gehyrde mycel gedwyld on manegum engliscum bocum. ðe ungelærede menn ðurh heora bilewitnysse to micclum wisdome tealdon. & me ofhreow þæt hi ne cuðon ne næfdon ða godspellican lare on heora gewritum. buton ðam mannum anum ðe þæt leden cuðon. & buton þam bocum ðe ælfred cyning snoterlice awende of ledene on englisc. ða synd to hæbbene. ÆCHom I (Pref) ll. 47-57; Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 176. The mention of King Alfred (†899) refers to his translation project where Gregory the Great's Dialogues and Pastoral Care, the Consolation of Philosophy of Boethius, Orosius's History of the World, Augustine's Soliloquies, and Bede's Ecclesastical History of the English People were translated into English by the king and his circle. See Fulk and Cain, History of Old English Literature, 48-69.

In constructing its self-identity, the academy went through a process of rejecting certain forms of dogmatically-driven reading that it saw as limited critical approaches to the New Testament text. Early medieval monastic readings clearly fall into this category; in order for the field to advance, these readings and their limitations had to be left behind. The process of stripping such limitations, however, has left behind prejudices. The thousand years or so of the medieval period between the end of Late Antiquity and the beginning of the Renaissance receive only scant treatment in the myths of origins found among critical biblical scholars. Even within treatments that mention so-called "pre-critical interpretation," the early medieval monastic milieu is slighted.

Werner G. Kümmel's classic study, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of its Problems, ³⁸ largely passes over the medieval period. He ignores it because of the boundaries that he places upon his investigation; his project is deliberately framed within an historical-critical perspective, so that he is entirely justified in stating, "it is improper to speak of scientific study of the New Testament or of a historical approach to primitive Christianity prior to the Enlightenment." Thus, Kümmel presents the period from the writing of the New Testament documents until the Reformation—14 centuries of Christian exegesis—in under seven pages. He directly names only five authors: Marcion, Origen, Dionysius of Alexandria, Eusebius, and Jerome. The entire medieval period merits one paragraph and no exegetes are mentioned, nor are any of their projects described.

Most New Testament surveys follow in Kümmel's footsteps. Those that do not tend to equate "medieval" with "Scholastic." For example, Robert Grant devotes a chapter in ³⁸ Werner G. Kümmel, The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of its Problems, translated by S. McLean Gilmour and Howard C. Kee (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972).

³⁹ Kümmel, Problems, 13.

⁴⁰ Kümmel, Problems, 13-19.

⁴¹ Kümmel, Problems, 19.

⁴² Scholasticism is "a method of philosophical and theological speculation which aimed at a better understanding of revealed truth by intellectual process" (Livingstone, Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church, 462). Leclercq identifies the chief difference between monastic and Scholastic procedures in the Scholastic drive for clarity over the monastic respect for authority (Leclercq, Love of Learning, 200). Additionally, Leclercq cites the non-monastic Peter Comestor without comment: "there are some who do more praying than his survey to the medieval interpretation of the Bible but focuses entirely on Scholastic interpretation. He locates interpretation within the genres of catena and glosses. There is no discussion of monastic interpretation as distinct from Scholasticism. Grant's brief survey transmits a surface impression of an unbroken allegorical commentary tradition located in the schools from the patristic period to the Reformation.⁴³

Aside from such broad (and clearly inadequate) surveys, two major works⁴⁴ within the field of biblical studies focus specifically on medieval exegesis, Beryl Smalley's important *Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages*⁴⁵ and Henri de Lubac's Exégèse médiévale.⁴⁶ Smalley primarily focuses on Scholastic interpretation,⁴⁷ allotting only a partial chapter to post-patristic pre-Scholastic interpretation.⁴⁸ Her description of the period following the Carolingian Revival is striking: noting a dearth of commentaries for a century and a quarter⁴⁹ she calls this period "a dramatic pause in the history of Bible studies."⁵⁰ Smalley explains it thus: "...the real reason was a shift of interest. The Cluniac and other tenth-century religious reformers emphasized the liturgy at the expense of study. As the offices multiplied, lectio divina moved out of the cloister into the choir."⁵¹ Thus, Smalley interprets the lack of commentaries and the increase in liturgies as a sign of a hiatus in "Bible studies" rather than a redirection of exegetical work.

re

reading: they are the cloister dwellers; there are others who spend all their time reading and rarely pray: they are the schoolmen" (Leclercq, Love of Learning, 198-9). The heyday of medieval Scholasticism can be dated between the work of Anselm of Bec (†1109) to William of Okham (†1347) with Thomas Aquinas (†1274) and Johannes Duns Scotus (†1308) regarded as its greatest lights.

⁴³ Robert M. Grant with David Tracy, A Short History of the Interpretation of the Bible (2d ed.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) pp. 83-4.

⁴⁴ One other work could possibly be included here, the second volume of the Cambridge History of the Bible: The West from the Fathers to the Reformation. However, I shall pass over this work as the section on "The Exposition and Exegesis of Scripture: From Gregory the Great to St Bernard" (pp. 183-197) is by Jean Leclercq and represents a considerable abridgement of his classic Love of Learning and Desire for God that will be discussed in detail below.

⁴⁵ Beryl Smalley, Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (3d ed.; Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1983).

⁴⁶ Henri de Lubac, Exégèse médiévale: Les quatre sens de l'écriture (2 vols.; Paris: Abier, 1959-1961) ET: Medieval Exegesis: The Four Senses of Scripture (trans. Mark Sebanc; 4 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998-forthcoming).

⁴⁸ Section I (The Carolingian Revival) in chapter 2 (Monastic and Cathedral Schools) address the specific period and environment under consideration here.

⁴⁹ Smalley, Study, 44.

⁵⁰ Ibid.

⁵¹ Smalley, Study, 44-45.

Ælfric receives only two brief mentions.⁵² Out of the mass of medieval materials, moreover, Smalley has selected one genre—the commentary—as the locus of biblical interpretation. While she accurately notes a shift in interest as a result of the Cluniac reforms of Benedictine practice, she does not consider that the liturgical productions of these monastic houses might be biblical interpretation as well; she labors under the assumption that liturgical materials must not involve biblical interpretation and vice-versa. In doing so, she established a prejudice inherited by the next several generations of scholars who equally dismissed material other than commentaries as something other than biblical interpretation.

Henri de Lubac's work on medieval exegesis is one of the great accomplishments of 20th century Roman Catholic scholarship. Encyclopedic in character, his study cites the majority of extant medieval sources and categorizes their treatments of the Scriptures into one of the four dominant senses. His is a massive and erudite work that sketches a grand narrative from Origen through the medieval period. His goal is to provide a foundation for a theological return to spiritual exegesis, historically located as a challenge to a dogmatic Thomism that tended to ignore the very patristic and medieval sources upon whom Thomas Aquinas relied. Therefore, de Lubac is interested in establishing the theological validity of the multiple senses of Scripture and is focused on them as theologically interpretive categories. With such a goal, de Lubac necessarily works programmaticly. As a result, he does not show how specific readers read within specific contexts; he cannot address the variety of interpretive contexts within which interpretation occurred; and, he ends up glossing over the fundamental distinctions between interpretations located in Scholastic debate or monastic homilies.

Ælfric is mentioned once in de Lubac's work. He appears as an example of the orators who "scarcely do more than plagiarize [Gregory the Great]." It is only fair to contextualize this remark, however, as part of an encomium to the enduring greatness and influence of Gregory. Immediately before this quotation, de Lubac correctly identifies the often overlooked debt that western homiletics owes to Gregory: "Through his Regula pastoralis, Gregory, along with Augustine and Rabanus Maurus, is the master of the art of preaching; through his other works he is the principal source of preaching itself, as well as spirituality." Thus, de Lubac's remark (which will be addressed later in this study) casts more glory on Gregory than shame on Ælfric.

⁵² Smalley, Study, 147 and 244.

⁵³ De Lubac, Medieval Exegesis, 2.120.

Overall, the interpretive practices of the early medieval monastic micro-culture have been ignored by earlier biblical scholarship. First, they have been rejected on paradigmatic grounds; they represent the "old" way of doing things that prevent an intellectually rigorous study of the New Testament documents. Second, they have been overshadowed by interpretive movements both before and after it: by patristic reading on one hand, and scholastic reading on the other. Third, they have been dismissed on grounds of genre; if biblical interpretation appears exclusively in commentaries and commentaries are lacking from the period, substantive interpretive work must not have occurred. Fourth, on the occasions when they have been considered, they have primarily been dismissed as plagiaristic of patristic readings. As a result, much work remains to be done on what the early medieval monastic interpretive practices actually were and whether the modern charges stand up to examination.

However, a shift is taking place. In recent years, a number of calls have been put forth to re-examine the promise and potential of exegesis from before the advent of critical study in the 18th century. In 1980, David Steinmetz wrote the provocatively titled essay, "The Superiority of Pre-Critical Exegesis" ⁵⁵ where he directly challenged the landmark 1859 comment of Benjamin Jowett that Scripture has one meaning—that of the human historically located author. Rather, Steinmetz argued, the medieval multiplicity of meanings and senses should be re-evaluated.

⁵⁴ Ibid.

⁵⁵ David C. Steinmetz, "The Superiority of Pre-Modern Exegesis," Theology Today 37 (1980): 1, 27-38.

More recently, Luke Johnson⁵⁶ has encouraged biblical scholars to rejoin the long conversation that unites religious practices and reading, offering Origen and Augustine of examples of interpreters from whom modern scholars have much to learn. Rather than engaging in an "either/or" approach that pit Scripture and the Tradition or history of interpretation against one another, Johnson counsels a "both/and" approach that appreciates the interpretive insights from earlier eras.⁵⁷ Furthermore, he commends a recognition of the difference between scientia and sapientia and a heightened commitment to sapientia. While Johnson speaks specifically in reference to revitalizing self-consciously Catholic biblical scholarship, his observations have broader application within the modern academic project. A symposium on the volume published in the journal Nove et Vetera continues the conversation with both Catholic and Protestant scholars joining in the call to more holistic reading strategies.⁵⁸

Ellen Davis and Richard Hayes (who participated in the Nova et Vetera symposium) have also raised the hermeneutical issue from a confessional perspective. Under the auspices of the Center of Theological Inquiry in Princeton, these Protestant scholars convened a group of academics and pastors "to overcome the fragmentation of the theological disciplines by reading scripture together" following the example of great premodern interpreters.⁵⁹ The result of their conversation was nine theses on Scripture interpretation and an edited volume, The Art of Reading Scripture.⁶⁰

Of the theses stated by Davis and Hayes, several follow along the lines sketched by Steinmetz, Johnson, and Kurz including reading the OT and NT as a unity and locating ⁵⁶ Luke T. Johnson and William S. Kurz, The Future of Catholic Biblical Scholarship: A Constructive Conversation (Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 2002).

⁵⁷ Johnson and Kurz, Future, 5-34.

⁵⁸ Nova et Vetera 4 (Winter 2006): 1, 95-200.

⁵⁹ Ellen F. Davis and Richard B. Hayes, "Learning to Read the Scriptures Again," The Christian Century (April 20, 2004): 23-24, 23.

⁶⁰ Ellen F. Davis and Richard B. Hayes, eds., The Art of Reading Scripture (Grand Rapids, Mich: William B. Eerdmans, 2003).

mutliple levels of meaning in the text.⁶¹ The seventh thesis focuses explicitly on recoving early interpretive methods: "The saints of the church provide guidance in how to interpret and perform scripture." The brief explanation of the thesis does not refer to specific interpreters, methods, nor periods, but remains a broad and general call.

The edited volume contains four additional programmatic essays by noted Protestant scholars including Steinmetz, Davis, Lutheran theologian Robert Jenson, and Anglican biblical scholar Richard Bauckham. A section entitled A Living Tradition contains five essays that interact with hitorical methods of interpretation including one on the continued usefulness of patristic exegesis. Again, there is no sustained focus on the methods of medieval exegesis—but doing so would be beyond the scope of volume.

Thus, there have been calls for renewed attention to premodern exegetical methods, but they have been broad and programmatic. The work of engaging and understanding early medieval interpretations in their specificity still remains to be done. While biblical scholars have not yet conducted this work, valuable contributions to this larger project have been made by scholars in other fields.

Positive Assessments of Early Medieval Monastic Reading

An influential study that addresses this topic from a more positive perspective approaches it cultural rather than exegetically. Jean Leclercq's The Love of Learning and the Desire for God: A Study of Monastic Culture is a masterful work that gathers together a lifetime of reflection and study within a monastic milieu. Leclercq succinctly summarizes the results of his study thus:

⁶¹ Davis and Hayes, "Learning," 24.

⁶² Brian E. Daley, "Is Patristic Exegesis Still Usable? Some Reflections on Early Christian Interpretation of the Psalms," pages 69-88 in The Art of Reading Scripture, Ellen F. Davis and Richard B. Hayes, eds., (Grand Rapids, Mich: William B. Eerdmans, 2003).

The principal literary sources of monastic culture may be reduced to three: The Holy Scripture, the patristic tradition, and classical literature. The liturgy, which will be treated later, is the medium through which the Bible and the patristic tradition are received, and it is the liturgy that gives unity to all the manifestations of monastic culture.⁶³

Leclercq's success in describing monastic exegesis is rooted in the scope of his study; he is not attempting to examine only the methods and literary production of monastic Scriptural reading. Instead, he sets it broadly within a study of the overall telos of monastic existence. Thus, he discusses the study of grammar as the essential background from which exegesis proceeds, he discusses the models for exegesis as represented by the patristic tradition, and he discusses the various literary forms that the monastics preferred and ultimately relates all of these to the liturgy which is at the heart of monastic practice and experience.

For Leclercq, the monastic culture is characterized by a tension between the two elements found in his title. He writes:

The content of monastic culture has seemed to be symbolized, synthesized, by these two words: grammar and spirituality. On the one hand, learning is necessary if one is to approach God and to express what is perceived of Him; on the other hand, literature must be continually transcended and elevated in the striving to attain eternal life.⁶⁴

Learning gives monastics the keys to begin the search for God in the Scriptures and the liturgy, but learning for its own sake is not the monastic goal. Instead, "the one end of the monastic life is the search for God." Exegesis plays a crucial role because it is therefore "entirely oriented toward life, and not toward abstract knowledge." Leclercq continually illustrates and delineates this monastic approach in contrast to the Scholastics:

65 Leclercq, Love of Learning, 18.

⁶³ Jean Leclercq, The Love of Learning and the Desire for God: A Study of Monastic Culture (trans. Catharine Misrahi, New York: Fordham University Press, 1982), 71.

⁶⁴ Leclercq, Love of Learning, 53.

⁶⁶ Leclercq, Love of Learning, 17.

The scholastic lectio takes the direction of the quaestio and the disputatio. The reader puts questions to the text and then questions himself on the subject matter: quaeri solet. The monastic lectio is oriented toward the meditatio and the oratio. The objective of the first is science and knowledge; of the second, wisdom and appreciation. In the monastery, the lectio divina, which begins with grammar, terminates in compunction, the desire for heaven.⁶⁷

Reading creates a theology rooted in experience. "Monastic speculation is the outgrowth of the practice of monastic life, the living of the spiritual life which is the meditation on Holy Scripture. It is biblical experience inseparable from liturgical experience." The purpose of monastic reading is to form the community into a lived and experienced Scriptural pattern where the desire for God takes the pride of place.

While the scope of his work enables Leclercq to appropriately situate monastic reading within monastic life, it also does not allow him the space within this slim volume to demonstrate the processes of which he speaks. He states clearly in his preface that the book is "a series of lectures given to young monks" as "an introductory work and therefore not intended for specialists, for already well-informed scholars." Rather:

Its purpose is not to offer a synthesis that would be premature, nor to provide a bibliography which can be found elsewhere, but to draw attention to subjects for further investigation and to suggest partial and provisional solutions.⁷¹

He does not, in a word, so much demonstrate as assert. Nevertheless, the vision that he presents has been found compelling and his seminal work is more often considered to be the last word on the subject than a tentative first word.

⁶⁷ Leclercq, Love of Learning, 72.

⁶⁸ Leclercq, Love of Learning, 213.

⁶⁹ Leclercq, Love of Learning, vii.

⁷⁰ Ibid.

⁷¹ Ibid.

A few scholars have taken up the call to build on this foundation. As far as exegesis is concerned, the only true successor of Leclercq's work is William T. Flynn's Medieval Music as Medieval Exegesis. Beginning with the synthetic vision of Leclercq,⁷² Flynn presents a dense and close-knit explication of the study of grammar, rhetoric, and ornamented language, the application of these arts to the teaching and composition of eleventh-century musical forms—especially the emerging chant genres of tropes, prose, and sequences—and Scripture interpretation within the liturgy. Ultimately, he examines a single liturgical manuscript, the Autun Troper, and demonstrates through a careful analysis of the Christmas and Easter Masses how the liturgies of these feasts explicate the biblical texts appointed through juxtaposition and exposition in the texts and music of the interpretive musical genres.

Flynn validates Leclercq's assertations concerning the liturgy as the ultimate locus of biblical interpretation and demonstrates how liturgy is interpretive. Leclercq's synthesis follows an educational trajectory moving from the formative sources of monastic culture, Scripture, the Patristic inheritance, and grammar, and ends at its products in theology and ultimately liturgy. Flynn takes a similar route and demonstrates how monastic formation is formation for the liturgy and how the music portions of the liturgy in turn have a formative, mystagogical effect:

All of the [musical] tropes are 'tropological' not because they explain what the choir should do about their faith but because they help them actually do it. For the principal participants, the choir, these liturgies could be expected to continue to reveal their riches as the clerics, monks, and nuns probed the mysteries of advanced latin grammar and applied this knowledge to their daily celebrations. ... In short, eleventh-century liturgies engaged the participants at their varying levels of expertise, opening the treasury of the sacred page in ways that could be appreciated by all.⁷³

⁷² William T. Flynn, Medieval Music as Medieval Exegesis (Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow, 1999), 1ff.

⁷³ Flynn, Medieval Music, 245.

Music and the liturgy was the practice at the heart of the canons' common life. Furthermore, the liturgy was therefore a means of teaching exeges and an exegetical product in its own right.

Flynn's work, then, examines the liturgy as both the fruit of exegetical process and as a means of formation into the process. His particular area of interest is the new compositional genres that appeared in the liturgy shortly before the end of the first millennium—the prose, trope, and sequence. He demonstrates their development from grammatical study, the study at the heart of monastic biblical exegesis, then demonstrates how these liturgical forms continue and enrich biblical understanding within the liturgies.

The only work which directly addresses Ælfric as an interpreter of Scripture is a brief eleven-page essay by Paul Szarmach, one of the great contemporary experts on Old English homiletical literature. Szarmach begins by noting the dearth of similar studies:

...[W]hen there is literary interest in Ælfric, it is in his style. Aside from studies of style and Milton McC. Gatch's important interpretive study emphasizing Ælfric's eschatology, the study of Ælfric remains broadly philological, i.e. showing an interest in manuscripts and sources, not at all in hermeneutics. In short, the study of Ælfric's exegesis is still at a nascent stage and often emerges as an adjunct to studies with other objectives in mind.

Szarmach, in contrast, presents this short study as a first word toward a larger appreciation of Ælfric as an exegete.

Szarmach's study opens by examining Ælfric's own reflections on the art of biblical interpretation. A central simile appears in Ælfric's homily on the five loaves and two fishes; Ælfric draws a distinction between a man who sees a fair painting and praises it and a man who reads fair characters and praises their author having not only appreciated the form of the letters but also understood the message they sought to convey. So it is with the miracle. It is not enough to look at it and wonder; profitable engagement requires an understanding of its spiritual significance to give God due praise for what has occurred.⁷⁴ Szarmach detects here a preference for binary understandings, finding terms or concepts like "words and images, ignorance and understanding, understanding and reaction" in which Ælfric finds a "complementary unity." ⁷⁵ To return to Johnson's language above, Ælfric identifies dualities, then embraces the "both/and" rather than the "either/or". Szarmach continues:

Ælfric's habit of mind is to find such [binary] pairing. When it comes to the important pair "understanding and reaction," the grounds change from the text to the audience. This shift of focus or emphasis explains how in other expositions the moral sense of scripture is a natural development; there is a habit of mind that enables Ælfric to move from analysis of text to moral application for the audience.

The movement from the text to a moral application is a natural mode for Ælfric.

From this point, Szarmach notes three major factors that help him characterize Ælfric's exegesis. The first is a recognition of a basic fact about interpretation and meaning within Ælfric's milieu. Modern interpreters often regard interpretation as a movement to a typological or allegorical level. Drawing on the work of Thomas D. Hill, ⁷⁶ Szarmach notes that "all too often Anglo-Saxonists think that exegesis is allegory." Instead, Szarmach demonstrates from both Augustine and Ælfric that "explanation of what is the literal sense is part of a long tradition"; historical and geographical references have to be explained and possible contradictions with other texts must be resolved (typically harmonized) before any deeper levels of the text can be sought. When, how, and why the literal sense has to be clarified is part of the exgetical task as well.

⁷⁴ Szarmach does not mention the source of this reflection but Bede is similarly reflective on how readers/hearers should find meaning in Christ's miracles in his treatment of a similar feeding story in John 6:1-14 (Bede Hom II.2).

⁷⁵ Szarmach, "Ælfric as Exegete," 239.

⁷⁶ Thomas D. Hill, "Literary History and Old English Poetry: The Case of Christ I, II, III," in Sources of Anglo-Saxon Culture, ed. Paul E. Szarmach (Studies in Medieval Culture 20; Kalamazoo, Mich.: The Medieval Institute, 1986), 3-22.

⁷⁷ Szarmach, "Ælfric as Exegete," 240.

The second factor to consider concerns what Ælfric learned from the early medieval homiliary tradition. Research reminds his readers that Ælfric did not just take material from the patristic excerpts he found there; he also learned exegetical method from these texts. The exegetical methods of Bede, Gregory, and Augustine—though sharing broad similarities—are different, and Szarmach suggests that Ælfric's facility in adapting and assimilating the distinct styles of patristic authors accounts for some of the interest in Ælfric's style.

The third factor that Szarmach identifies is "the narrative impulse." While Ælfric's second cycle of Catholic Homilies contains a more narrative character than the first, Szarmach points beyond this observation to the notion that Ælfric understands the Bible "primarily as story, secondarily as text for analysis." The sermon for Palm Sunday illustrates the point; Ælfric deftly weaves a harmony of the gospels to concisely convey an orthodox Passion of his own creation: "...the effect of the Palm Sunday homily is the effect of a narrative, shaped and formed to stand as a sequence of events in time. Ælfric has made narrative sense of his varied sources." When faced with complexities on the literal level, Ælfric's instinct is to tell the story within the text as clearly as possible

Szarmach ends his brief study with an cogent appeal to his fellow scholars:

Anglo-Saxonists must unburden themselves from antecendent scholarship that either blatantly or subtly brings with it assumptions that are invalid for the late tenth century. A self-concious and proper historicism can help establish a context for discussion. With this context, which must take into imaginative account Ælfric's use of sources, the development of early medieval theology, and the valid meaning of early medieval exegesis, it will be possible to assess more accurately Ælfric's role as medieval "father" and to move on to ⁷⁸ I take up the shape and scope of this tradition at the end of chapter 2.

⁷⁹ Szarmach, "Ælfric as Exegete," 241.

⁸⁰ Ibid

⁸¹ Szarmach, "Ælfric as Exegete," 243.

related cultural issues such as Ælfric's audience, the problem of rendering the Christian message to it (a new form of the translatio question, it would appear), and even perhaps a new definition of Christian literature. The new view of Ælfric that will thus result will have to account for issues of Christian genres and styles as well.⁸²

Thus, Szarmach's study itself is fundamentally another programmatic essay, but one from a veteran scholar of Anglo-Saxon literature, especially homiletics.

Ælfric is a Benedictine Revival-era preacher. Szarmach insists that Ælfric and his exegesis be read in terms of his late tenth century setting and the forces that produced it. Leclercq and Flynn signal that the fundamental paradigm for early medieval monastic biblical interpretation is the liturgy. An early medieval monastic sermon, therefore, should not be treated as an independent or acontextual text—a free-standing document in the same way that a biblical commentary can be—but is rightly considered when located securely within the context of early medieval monastic liturgies and their interpretive practices.

BUILDING A CONVERSATION

Selecting Texts

To begin the conversation building process, I consider first what texts might be used to focus the conversation. Recalling again a fundamental criterion, the texts selected must be engaged by both sets of conversation partners. Since modern commentaries cover every verse of the biblical text, Ælfric's corpus becomes the limiting factor. His sermons follow closely the gospel readings appointed by the early medieval Church calendar. Of the seventy-five surviving witnesses to gospel lectionaries from the span of the Anglo-Saxon period in England, 457 readings are from Matthew, 391 from Luke, 234 from John, and 155 from Mark. Looking at Ælfric's sermons in the Catholic Homilies, the ratios are similar; of the 80 items, 28 are from Matthew, 24 from Luke, 23 from John, and 5 from Mark. Based on lectionary statistics, Matthew emerges as the favorite gospel. More importantly, however,

-

⁸² Szarmach, "Ælfric as Exegete," 244.

Matthew is the gospel most focused on the notion of constructing a community around the life, death and resurrection of Jesus.

For the early and medieval church, Matthew was the First Gospel, both in terms of its canonical position⁸³ and its importance to the growth and formation of Christian communities. Matthew was the most commented upon and most frequently cited of the gospels in the patristic period,⁸⁴ and the Sermon on the Mount was the most frequently cited pericope of Scripture.⁸⁵ Liturgically, Matthew became the dominant text cited in both liturgies and lectionaries of the West.⁸⁶ Two features of the text in particular enabled Matthew to achieve this status: first, the completeness of its account of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus gave Christian communities identity through the birth, deeds, and death of their founder;⁸⁷ second, the ecclesial usefulness of its catechetical collections of dominical sayings made it a teaching resource par excellence.

In addition, the western church took the communal references within the text seriously. Under the influence of texts like Acts, Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, and Jerome's Chronicon, the church assumed direct continuity between the community of the apostles and that of their own day. The polity of the western church was mapped onto the Matthean text so thoroughly that Peter's confession (Matthew 16) became a central text undergirding

_

⁸³ I will not attempt to speculate on the dynamics of this decision; the process through which Matthew was placed first canonically is not historically available to us. Our earliest data on canonical organization consistently puts Matthew in first place; while the relative locations of the other gospels fluctuated, Matthew always appears first. This placement may be related to assumptions about its date on the basis of its original language (thought to be "Hebrew") and its apostolic authorship or may be related to its functionality. My point here is that it always remained "first." See the canonical lists found on Appendix 1 of Carl R. Holladay, A Critical Introduction to the New Testament: Interpreting the Message and Meaning of Jesus Christ (Nashville: Abingdon, 2005). The appendix appears on the cd-rom in the standard edition, or in vol. 2, pp. 871-880 in the Expanded edition.

⁸⁴ Graham N. Stanton, "Matthew, Gospel of," in volume 2 of the Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation (ed. John H. Hayes, ed.; 2 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1999), 136-141, 136.

⁸⁵ W. S. Kissinger, "Sermon on the Mount," in volume 2 of the Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation (ed. John H. Hayes, ed.; 2 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1999), 462-466, 462. Clearly, the accuracy of these claims is based on extant materials, recognizing the amount of early Christian material that has not survived.

⁸⁶ The Old Latin order of the gospels arranges them in order of their liturgical frequency at that time: Matthew, John, Luke, Mark.

⁸⁷ Patristic authors often compared it to Mark who came out—in Augustine's famous words—as the "pedisequus et breviator" (De Cons. 1.2[4].).

arguments for the primacy of the bishop of Rome. Both the communal and the formational aspects of the gospel were embraced to the fullest. Since the early medieval monastic microculture privileged both community and life-long formation into the example of Jesus, an examination of how Ælfric read Matthew is a natural choice.

With twenty-eight available sermons on Matthean texts, we have a sizeable sample from which to choose. I have chosen to focus on four texts that represent four major literary forms appearing within Matthew: a mythological narrative (Matt 4:1–11), a dominical teaching (Matthew 5:1–12), a set of healing miracles (Matt 8:1–13), and a parable (Matt 25:1–13). Surveying a range of materials will enable us to examine what interpretive strategies are used for the literary different forms, and whether strategies change with the form under consideration or are uniform throughout.

Selecting Conversation Partners

To represent the modern academic micro-culture's side of the conversation, I have chosen four recent commentaries on Matthew: Ulrich Luz's work translated by James Crouch for the Hermeneia series, 88 W. D. Davies and Dale Allison's work for the International Critical Commentary series, 90 Douglas Hare's work for the Interpretation series, 90 and Eugene Boring's portion for the New Interpreter's Bible commentary. 91 Of the central literary genres produced by the modern academy—commentaries, monographs, and scholarly articles—the commentary best presents the exegetical perspectives and outlooks of representative scholars that will address all four selected pericopes. All of these ⁸⁸ Ulrich Luz, Matthew 1-7: A Continental Commentary, trans. Wilhelm C. Linss, (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992). Ulrich Luz, Matthew 8-20: A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew, trans. James E. Crouch, (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001). Ulrich Luz, Matthew 21-28, trans. James E. Crouch, (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005).

⁸⁹ W. D. Davies and Dale C. Allison, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew, 3 vols. (International Critical Commentary 26; London/New York: T&T Clark International, 2004).

⁹⁰ Douglas Hare, Matthew (Interpretation; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995).

⁹¹ M. Eugene Boring, "Matthew," in The New Interpreter's Bible: Matthew-Mark, ed. Leander E. Keck (vol. 8; Nashville: Abingdon, 1995), 87-506.

commentaries have been selected from recognized series that represent the main stream of modern biblical interpretation.

The first two are recognized scholarly commentaries that are written specifically for the modern academic micro-culture—these are works by the academy for the academy. Luz's commentary stands squarely within the European commentary tradition. His approach is a combination of literary and historical methods that are characterized by his two major working hypotheses: first, that "the Gospel of Matthew tells the story of Jesus' activity in Israel" which is a story of conflict between Jesus and the Jewish leaders, embedded in which is the story of Jesus' relationship with his disciples; ⁹² second, "the experiences of the Matthean church are reflected in the Matthean Jesus story" which is a two-level drama where the conflict-story of Jesus is understood as an allegory for the situation of the Matthean community. ⁹³ Davies and Allison present a textually focused commentary that discusses lexical and grammatical issues and particularly focuses upon textual or thematic parallels in contemporary Jewish and Greco-Roman literature.

The last two are, like Ælfric's work, cross-cultural. They are intended to mediate the findings of the modern academic endeavor to confessionally Christian micro-cultures, particularly for the work of teaching and preaching—these are works by the academy for broader Christian audiences. Hare's approach is generally literary. He is not explicit about his methods but uses a combination of narrative readings, literary parallels, and clarifications of the historical context as the basis of his exegesis. Boring also uses these tools but is more explicit in his use of a narrative approach as a framing device. He identifies a chiastic structure that is rooted in conflict—similar to Luz—but Boring emphasizes that the central conflict is apocalyptic in nature. Thus, while drawing on the same kinds of literary, historical and rhetorical methods as the rest, he gives a prominent place to Matthew's own theological perspective in his work. 95

92 Luz, Matthew 1-7, 11.

⁹³ Ibid

⁹⁴ While it could be both possible and interesting to look at sermons on Matthew by modern academics, this would be at cross-purposes with our project. Due to the faith commitments required and the differing context of proclamation, these texts would misrepresent the explicitly non-confessional character of the modern academy's exegetical project.

The Aim of the Conversation

The purpose of this conversation is twofold: first, to clarify the primary interpretive contexts and methods of the early medieval monastic micro-culture; second, to assess its usefulness as a foil for modern academic readings. In other words, through the conversation model, I hope to identify interpretive strengths and weaknesses of both conversation partners, to assess what areas of potential meaning within the biblical text early medieval methods identify more clearly than modern, and to show what early medieval monastic methods and results have to offer modern scholarship. At the same time, I acknowledge the ways that modern methods represent significant insights on their own terms. Furthermore, I explore the fruitfulness of early medieval conversation partners as aids in moving beyond modern critical impasses. As outsiders in modern critical debates, Ælfric and his sources may provide alternative approaches or perspectives that open interpretive possibilities where modern interpreters are locked in disagreement.

The point is not to judge between the interpretive projects of the two micro-cultures and to declare one superior, the other inferior. Rather, coming from the academy on behalf of the academy, I hope to show how these older methods may help us access more complete interpretive possibilities inherent in the Matthean text and how Matthew has served in the past as a catalyst for the formation of intentional Christian communities.

THE SHAPE OF THE CONVERSATION

Moving forward, chapter two will be an examination of the commonalities between the modern academic micro-culture and the early medieval monastic micro-culture. This chapter will explore three fundamental characteristics that are central to both cultures: mimesis, literary focus, and critical conversations.

⁹⁵ More attention will be given to these modern commentaries in chapter 2.

Chapter three will examine the fundamental differences between the two cultures. Because the modern context is much better known, I shall focus here on the primary interpretive context of the early medieval monastic micro-culture, the monastic liturgy, and the interpretive forces this context exerts upon the discursive interpretation found in monastic preaching.

Once the pertinent features of the two micro-cultures have been investigated, I can address the Matthean texts themselves. Chapter four treats Matthew 4:1–11 and Matthew 5:1–12; chapter five treats Matthew 8:1–13 and Matthew 25:1–13. For each pericope, I examine the interpretations of the four modern interpreters, then consider Ælfric's text and the liturgical context that informs it. Then, I put the modern and medieval into dialogue with one another, assessing the areas of strength for the various interpreters and suggesting how Ælfric's early medieval monastic interpretation may contribute to the modern academic interpretive project.

Chapter six offers be a brief summary of my findings, and presents a concluding statement of what Ælfric and other early medieval monastic interpreters might have to offer the modern discipline of biblical studies.

Chapter 2

Introduction

In his classic study of monastic culture, Jean Leclercq summarizes his synthesis in a compact paragraph:

The principl literary sources of monastic culture may be reduced to three: Holy Scripture, the patristic tradition, and classical literature. The liturgy. . . is the medium through which the Bible and the patristic tradition are received, and it is the liturgy that gives unity to all the manifestations of monastic culture.⁹⁶

Gathering up these sources and moving beyond the solely literary, monastic culture can be characterized as mimetic, literary, and liturgical. Individually these marks are not unique to monastic culture—indeed, modern New Testament scholarship is also characterized by the first two marks—but the ways it embodies these marks and the ends it pursues by this embodiment give this culture its unique character. In order to appreciate both the continuities and discontinuities between the two profoundly literary cultures of early medieval monasticism and modern New Testament scholarship it is worth examining how each has embody mimetic and literary qualities, and how such qualities build upon and reinforce one another. Both also operate within a critical conversation—a conversation with special rules, resources, and patrons solemnly invoked. The final monastic dimension, the liturgical, serves as a point of entry into the key differences between the early medieval monastic and modern academic cultures.

The three points of similarity—mimetic and literary qualities and the critical conversation—are discussed in the present chapter. The liturgical quality of monastic culture and the difference that makes is discussed in chapter 3. Within these chapters, more emphasis is placed upon the early medieval monastic environment. This is not intend as a slight to modern academic culture, nor should the disparity reflect and attempt to privilege the monastic over the academic. Rather, the modern academic culture is assumed to be more familiar to my readers. While familiarity does not necessarily lead to greater self-awareness, I shall spend more of my time attempting to explain the early medieval monastic culture.

⁹⁶ Jean Leclercq, The Love of Learning and the Desire for God: A Study of Monastic Culture (trans. Catharine Misrahi, New York: Fordham University Press, 1982), 71.

MIMETIC CULTURES

The Scientific Study of the NT

William Baird's introduction to his history of New Testament scholarship makes explicit an assumption that governs not only his work but presents a dominant understanding of critical scholarship: "I am convinced that NT research is essentially the work of creative individuals who, although in dialogue with their predecessors, peers, and pupils, spend long hours in the isolation of their studies." Baird's strategy properly foregrounds individual scholars. In the academic study of the New Testament, ideas are produced by individuals, for individuals. And yet in this statement, Baird places in the background a formative community that molds and influences—to a degree—the individual scholars. Scholars are shaped by their "predecessors, peers, and pupils" and, in the modern American academy at least, the most intentional part of this formational process is the mimetic nature of graduate education.

Mimesis is not a term commonly applied to the scientific study of the New Testament, and yet it is a crucial aspect of the process of forming New Testament scholars. Graduate programs shape scholars through a mimetic process that uses literary and human models for imitation focusing on Baird's "predecessors." The purpose of this mimetic process is the formation of patterns and habits of thought; through studying the epochical works in the field and working with departmental mentors, students learn how to think like New Testament scholars.

⁹⁷ William Baird, The History of New Testament Research: Volume One: From Deism to Tübingen (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1992), xx.

Literary Mimesis

Coursework, comprehensive examinations, and the preliminary aspects of dissertation research focus graduate students upon a representative portion of the discipline's corpus, emphasizing certain formative works. This emphasis fulfills two purposes. On one hand, it acquaints students with the content of the field, teaching the major theories, approaches, and conflicts in the academic study of the New Testament; this is the most obvious purpose of the course of study. On the other hand, the major works of New Testament scholarship constantly provide models for imitation with particular examples of the genre and forms of academic literature, critical method, and acceptable patterns of discourse. Through this mimetic process, classic works and forms establish paradigms for the academic study of the New Testament.

Reading the works of the academic study of the New Testament enculturates students into the main forms of scholarly literature: the journal article, the critical monograph, and the commentary are the prime literary expressions of scholarly research. Reading these works as assignments passively reinforces the active formation through mandatory writing assignments. Papers—exegetical, analytical, and critical—train students to write journal articles and scholarly essays; the dissertation is the student's entrée into the world of the critical monograph. In these assignments, imitation and replication of the classical forms is encouraged through the instructors' grades and comments intended to shape both skills and disposition.

Personal

Mimesis in academic formation is not merely literary, however. In the American system, students enter a department where they are expected to work with and model themselves after the several professors who form the department. Mandatory stints as teaching assistants help to shape students in their department's pedagogical strategies.

Departmental colloquia display the give and take in the presentation of ideas as preparation for later presentations at academic conferences. Although students are encouraged to learn from all of their professors, a primary focus is placed on the relationship with the dissertation director.

The principal academic relationship is between students and their Doktorvater. While students are expected to learn from and model themselves after all of the professors in their program, students primarily model themselves after their dissertation director. In some programs, the advisor presents the student with a fully-formed dissertation topic in line with the director's research areas. The director's model is actively placed upon the student. In others, the student may work with one aspect of their director's field of research. Either way, the student's research and scholarship is shaped by their director's own work and approaches.

The role of mimesis in graduate education is apparent in practice through academic self-presentation. Scholars identify themselves as students of a particular mentor, and as graduates of a particular school. Academic lineages shape—often quite directly—the particular selection of the Scriptural canon within which the scholar works, the methods the scholar employs, and the larger intellectual purposes for which these methods are deployed. Pauline scholars form other Pauline scholars; more particularly, Pauline scholars of rhetoric form other Pauline scholars of rhetoric. Mimesis lies at the heart of the academic enterprise.

As important as mimesis is in graduate programs, however, its formal or institutional character ends with the attainment of the doctoral degree. Baird's "peers and pupils" may exhibit an influence upon scholars, and some may cultivate collegial conversation but it is nowhere mandated nor enforced. The most practical way in which mimesis continues after graduation is through tenure and promotion reviews, during which scholars are evaluated by other scholars in temrs of their academic productivity and creativity. Professional guilds like the Society of Biblical Literature gather scholars into fields and sub-fields, placing them in productive conversation with one another but for the most part each scholar's work is self-directed, neither mandated by the community nor enforced by it. Indeed, academic freedom is essential to the advancement of the field.

A key word in Baird's statement, though, is "creative." Mimesis and imitation are pursued in the formation process but the goal of the process is the production of creative independent scholars. Creativity and originality of thought are essential for the academic study of the text to move forward; imitation in the sense of rehashing and recycling old ideas does not represent progress in the discipline. A formative imitation is cultivated precisely in order that formal imitation may end. The imposition of a temporary dependence instills the knowledge and skills necessary for independence.

Thus, the academic study of the New Testament contains a mimetic component. Future scholars are formed by reading literary models and imitating them in the assignments of formal coursework. Furthermore, personal interaction with professors in coursework, as pedagogical models, and engagement in colloquia present human models for imitation. Once the process of graduate formation is complete, mimesis becomes only one of many factors directing scholarship; creative independent scholarship within the bounds of received literary forms is the telos of the mimetic process.

Mimesis in Early Medieval Monastic Culture

Tucked in the midst of Ælfric's Lives of the Saints stands a text for general use. Like the others, it bears the marks of a homily—including a brief Scriptural passage—but was probably intended more for private reading than for public proclamation. Unlike the others, which focus on particular deeds of particular saints or which address particular liturgical occasions⁹⁸ this work is general enough to serve as an introduction to the whole set. In fact, ⁹⁸ The Lives of the Saints contain works on the feasts of Christmas (ÆLS (Christmas)), the Exaltation of the Cross (ÆLS (Exalt of Cross)), the fast of Ash Wednesday (ÆLS (Ash Wed)) and Mid-Lent (ÆLS (Pr Moses)).

Godden has suggested that it did originally function in this fashion and that its current placement—sixteenth in the collection—is a dislocation from an original initial position.⁹⁹

This work, entitled Sermon on the Memory of the Saints, ¹⁰⁰ contains a survey of sanctity. The first half presents examples. It begins by touching upon various heroes of the OT and identifying the virtues that made them stand out. Turning to the NT, Ælfric discusses John the Baptist, Christ himself, then the apostles and disciples. A discussion of the various kinds of post-biblical confessors rounds out this half. An exhortation concerning the evils of the present time and immanence of the Antichrist segues into the second half. This half is a formal explication of the three theological virtues, the eight chief sins and their remedies, the eight chief virtues. A concluding exhortation encourages the cultivation of the virtues as primary weapons against the Devil and sin.

This work communicates the early medieval monastic concept of mimesis. First, it presents human exemplars for imitation drawn primarily from the Bible and secondarily from the history of the Church. Preeminent among these is Christ himself. Second, it draws out—implying induction through juxtaposition—the specific moral lessons that the holy histories teach, the specific virtues cultivated by the saints and the corresponding vices they overcame. It identifies who is to be modeled and the specific qualities of what is to be modeled. Furthermore it also locates the telos—why these are to be modeled. Saints are not just examples; they embody the goal.

The sermon on the Memory of the Saints is clearly not an exegetical work. Nevertheless, a passage of Scripture, namely Rev 1:8, stands at the head of the work and provides a starting place. Playing off the multiple senses of the words "beginning" and "end" Ælfric translates the passage from the Vulgate into Old English, then uses it as a point of departure:

⁹⁹ MS data.

¹⁰⁰ Sermo de Memoria Sanctorum; ÆLS (Memory of Saints).

Ego sum Alfa et W. Initium et finis dicit Dominus Deus qui est et qui erat et qui venturus est omnipotens. That is in English: I am the beginning and the end says the Lord God who was and who is and who is coming, the Almighty (God). There is one Almighty God, ever existing in three natures, who shaped all things. Now, we have our beginning through him because he shaped us when we were not and afterward redeemed us when we were lost. Now we should be careful with great [concern] that our life may be structured so our end might end in God who came to us at our beginning.101

English translations are my own.

By using "beginning" both as a temporal marker and as a source, Ælfric can make "end" serve as a final temporal marker and as a telos. The anagogical use of these temporal terms sets up an eternal aim for his audience. The next sentence clarifies how his hearers should strive for this goal: "We may take good examples, first from the holy patriarchs who pleased God in their lives and also from the holy ones who followed the Savior." The exhortation that lies at the end of the piece ties the systematic exposition of the virtues into this overarching anagogical scheme as Ælfric notes in a concluding line: "We may, through God's help, overcome these evil vices through struggle if we fight bravely and [may] have in the end the eternal glory forever with God himself if we toil here and now." 103

Mimesis for Ælfric, then, is a life-long process through which monastics pattern themselves after Christ, his forbearers and saints, and cultivate the virtues through which they will attain to the eternal joys of God's presence. Imbedded in LS 16 are the monastic ¹⁰¹ Ego sum Alfa et ώ. Initium et finis dicit dominus Deus. qui est et qui erat et qui uenturus est omnipotens. Dæt is on englisc. Ic eom angin. and ende. cwæþ drihten god. seðe is. and seðe was. and seðe towerd is ælmihtig god. An ælmihtig god is on þrym hadum æfre wunigende. seþe ealle þincg gesceop. nu habbe we anginn þurh hine. forðan þe he us gesceop. þaða we næron and us eft alysde þa þa we for-wyrhte wæron. Nu sceole we hogian mid mycelne gymene. þæt ure lif beo swa gelogód. þæt ure geendige on gód. þanon þe ús þæt angin com. ÆLS (Memory of Saints), ll. 1-8. William W. Skeat, ed., Aelfric's Lives of saints, being a set of sermons on saints' days formerly observed by the English church, Vol. 1, EETS 82 (London: N. Trübner & Co., 1881), 336. All Old values that place a premium upon personal modeling and which spawned a literature of example that quickly became foundational for the spread of monasticism and the monastic ethos.

¹⁰² We magon niman gode bysne. ærest be ðam halgum heah-fæderum. hu hi on heora life gode gecwemdon. and eac æt þam halgum þe þam hælende folgodon. ÆLS (Memory of Saints), ll. 9-12. Ibid.

¹⁰³ We magon þurh godes fylst ða feondlican leahtras mid gecampe ofer-winnan. gif we cwnlice feohtað. and habban us on ende þone ecan wurð-mynt. á mid gode sylfum gif we swincað nu hér. ÆLS (Memory of Saints), ll. 378-81. Skeat, Aelfrie's Lives of saints, 362.

Personal Mimesis and the Monastic Community

The core legislative documents of the Western monastic movement construct a community grounded in imitation and mutual correction for the purpose of fulfilling the commands of Scripture and thus embodying the virtues of Christ. Legislative documents like the works of John Cassian, the Rule of Columban and the Rule of St Benedict should be understood less as distinct legislative documents but instead vehicles for the transmission of a common body of teaching:

The various rules were merely so many individual expressions of the tradition. All the ancient monks considered their real rule, in the sense of the ultimate determinant of their lives, to be not some product of human effort but the Word of God himself as contained in the Scriptures. Monasticism was simply a form of the Christian life itself, and hence it drew its inspiration from divine revelation.¹⁰⁴

The Rule of St. Benedict became normative in early medieval Europe through its adoption at synods in Aachen chaired by St Benedict of Aniane in 816 and 817 and subsequently achieved authoritative status throughout the Carolingian empire. Benedict of Aniane's writings clarify that the Rule's normativity comes not from the inherent superiority of its legislation above other competing rules but rather because it most clearly exemplified the common tradition. Therefore the legislative work of John Cassian, the Institutes (and the Conferences to a lesser degree), and the Rule of Benedict are mutual witnesses of a common way of life handed down by monastic communities and bolstered by documents of legislation and exhortation.

¹⁰⁴ Claude Peifer, "The Rule of St. Benedict," in RB 1980: The Rule of St. Benedict in English and Latin with Notes, Ed.Timothy Fry, (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1980), 65-112, 85.

¹⁰⁵ Claude Peifer, "The Rule in History," in RB 1980: The Rule of St. Benedict in English and Latin with Notes, Ed.Timothy Fry, (Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1980), 113-151, 121-122.

John Cassian was, with Evagrius of Pontus, the main figure responsible for the transmission of the monastic tradition from the East to the West. Probably a native of the Balkans, John and his comrade Germanus journeyed to Bethlehem in the last quarter of the fourth century to join a monastery. Itching to see the roots of monasticism for themselves, they left the monastery and made two successive journeys to the monastic motherland, Egypt. Later ordained a deacon by St John Chrysostom and exiled from the East for supporting the controversial patriarch, he settled in Gaul around 410, founding monastic communities and writing of his experiences for the benefit of the nascent monastic movement there.

The Institutes, composed between 419 and 426, are the closest that Cassian produced to a rule. A monastic rule:

normally includes, on the one hand, theoretical spiritual teaching and, on the other, practical regulations to govern the daily life of the monastery by determining the time and measure of food, sleep, and liturgical prayer, relationships with the outside, authority structures, etc. These two elements may be combined in quite different proportions. Some rules contain chiefly spiritual doctrine, some consist almost exclusively of practical regulations; others combine both.¹⁰⁶

Of the twelve books of the Institutes, the first four are chiefly practical, detailing the minutiae of Egyptian monastic practice; the later eight are spiritual instruction on the eight chief vices and their remedies.¹⁰⁷

10

¹⁰⁶ Peifer, "Rule of St. Benedict," 85.

¹⁰⁷ Book 1: Of the Dress of the Monks; Book 2: Of the Canonical System of the Nocturnal Prayers and Psalms; Book 3: Of the Canonical System of the Daily Prayers and Psalms; Book 4: Of the Institutes of the Renunciants; Book 5: Of the Spirit of Gluttony; Book 6 Of the Spirit of Fornication; Book 7: Of the Spirit of Covetousness; Book 8: Of the Spirit of Anger; Book 9: Of the Spirit of Dejection; Book 10: Of the Spirit of Accidie; Book 11: Of the Spirit of Vainglory; Book 12: Of the Spirit of Pride. The items and orders of the vices

In both sections, Cassian constantly appeals to the principle of imitation and describes its practical application. Men seeking admission to a monastery must first serve a year under the elder who oversees the hospitality of guests, learning the basics of humility, obedience, and service, ¹⁰⁸ then are turned over to an elder who oversees ten junior monks ¹⁰⁹ to be taught the alphabet of virtues, "first syllables in the direction of perfection." ¹¹⁰ The junior monks remain under the authority of the elders, ever learning from them the virtues, chiefly discretion, obedience, and humility. ¹¹¹ These monks are exhorted to observe all their seniors, not just those placed over them, but the community as a whole. Just a few ought to be selected as particular models for imitation while the novice advances:

In order to attain more easily to [virtue], you should seek out, while you live in the community, examples of a perfect life that are worthy of imitation; they will come from a few, and indeed from one or two, but not from the many. For, beyond the fact that a life that has been scrutinized and refined is found in few, there is a question of utility to be considered—that a person is more carefully schooled and formed for the perfection of this chosen orientation (namely, the cenobitic life) by the example of one.¹¹²

Once monks have reached a more advanced level, Cassian commends advice attributed to St Anthony, the Father of Egyptian—and therefore all—Monasticism:

For it is an ancient and admirable saying of the blessed Antony to the effect that when a monk, after having opted for the cenobium, is striving to the heights of a still loftier perfection, has seized upon the consideration of discretion and is already able to rely on his own judgment and to come to the pinnacle of the anchorite life, he must not seek all the are exactly the same as in Ælfric's ÆLS (Memory of Saints) and the same virtues are prescribed for combat the various vices. Whether or not Ælfric was working directly from the Institutes, he is clearly participating in the common tradition.

¹⁰⁸ John Cassian, Inst. 4.7; citations from John Cassian's Institutes are from Boniface Ramsey, trans., The Institutes (Ancient Christian Writers 58; N.Y., N.Y.: Newman, 2000). Ramsey, Institutes, 81.

¹⁰⁹ John Cassian, Inst. 4.8; Ramsey, Institutes, 82.

¹¹⁰ John Cassian, Inst. 4.9; NPNF 2.11.231.

¹¹¹ John Cassian, Inst. 4.10; Ramsey, Institutes, 83.

¹¹² John Cassian, Inst. 4.40; Ramsey, Institutes, 100.

kinds of virtue from one person, however outstanding he may be. For there is one adorned with the flowers of knowledge, another who is more strongly fortified by the practice of discretion, another who is solidly founded in patience, one who excels in the virtue of humility and another in that of abstinence, while still another is decked with the grace of simplicity, this one surpasses the others by his zeal for magnanimity, that one by mercy, another one by vigils, yet another by silence, and still another by toil. Therefore the monk who, like a most prudent bee, is desirous of storing up spiritual honey must suck the flower of a particular virtue from those who possess it most intimately, and he must lay it up carefully in the vessel of his heart. He must not begrudge a person for what he has less of, but he must contemplate and eagerly gather up only the virtuousness that he possesses. For if we want to obtain all of them from a single individual, either examples will be hard to find, or, indeed, there will be none that would be suitable for us to imitate. The reason for this is that, although we see that Christ has not yet been made "all in all" (to cite the words of the Apostle), we can nonetheless in this fashion find him partly in all. For it is said of him that "by God's doing he was made for us wisdom, righteousness, holiness, and redemption." Inasmuch, therefore, as there is wisdom in one, righteousness in another, holiness in another, meekness in another, chastity in another, and humility in another, Christ is now divided among each of the holy ones, member by member. But when we are all assembled together in the unity of faith and virtue, he appears as "the perfect man," completing the fullness of his body in the joining together and in the characteristics of the individual members. 113

For Cassian, then, the practice of virtue is not fundamentally the cultivation of self-improvement. Rather, as monastics grow in virtue they grow into the fullness of Christ and as constituent members of the Body of Christ, they contribute to the eschatological consummation when Christ will be all in all. The quest for virtue is the quest to more fully and completely participate in the life and redemptive work of the Risen Lord.

-

¹¹³ John Cassian, Inst. 5.4; Ramsey, Institutes, 118-9.

St Benedict in his rule works along the same lines. The three Benedictine vows, obedience, stability, and conversion of life, 114 are designed to construct an environment in which long-term mimesis is made possible. Benedict makes clear in a number of ways that the first two are prerequisites for the third, demonstrating this most eloquently in his opening chapter. Clearly adapting Conf. 18.4-8, Benedict describes cenobites by describing what they are not—neither sarabaites nor gyrovagues. The first kind of monks live without an abbot and thus without obedience: "Their law is what they like to do, whatever strikes their fancy. Anything they believe in and choose, they call holy; anything they dislike, they consider forbidden." 115 As a result, "with no experience to guide them, no rule to try them, as gold is tested in a furnace, [they] have a character as soft as lead." The second kind have no stability. Rather they "spend their entire lives drifting from region to region, staying as guests or three of four days in different monasteries. Always on the move, they never settle down, and are slaves to their own wills and gross appetites. In every way they are worse than sarabaites."117 Without these two vows, conversion of life is impossible. Mimesis is a process that requires time, discipline and the external controls of a rule and an abbot to curb the destructive impulses of self-will.

Instead, Benedict constructs the abbot as both the head of the community and the linchpin of the chain of command that stretches from heaven to earth. On one hand, "He is believed to hold the place of Christ in the monastery since he is addressed by a title of Christ." Being in the place of Christ, his word commands obedience no matter how absurd or impossible his orders appear; ¹¹⁹ the monastics are bound to "carry out the ¹¹⁴ RB 58. The more familiar triple vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience are those of the mendicant orders that arose in the High Middle Ages (particularly the Franciscans and Dominicans). To be sure, poverty and chastity are intrinsic to life under the cenobitic rule as well.

_

¹¹⁵ RB 1.8-9. Fry, RB 1980, 171.

¹¹⁶ RB 1.6. Fry, RB 1980, 169.

¹¹⁷ RB 1.10-11. Fry, RB 1980, 171.

¹¹⁸ RB 2.2. Fry, RB 1980, 173. Benedict here connects the word "abbot" with the Aramaic "abba" used in Rom 8:15.

¹¹⁹ RB 92; passim.

superior's order as promptly as if the command came from God himself." This commanded obedience gives no opportunity for tyranny for the abbot himself is also one set under authority:

Therefore the abbot must never teach or decree or command anything that would deviate from the Lord's instructions. On the contrary, everything he teaches and commands should, like the leaven of divine justice, permeate the minds of his disciples. . . . Furthermore, anyone who receives the name of abbot is to lead his disciples by a twofold teaching: he must point out to them all that is good and holy more by example than by words, but demonstrating God's instructions to the stubborn and dull by a living example. 121

Standing in the place of Christ means, therefore, that the abbot must provide the preeminent example of holiness in both words and works for the community. As Christ, he is responsible for the charges put into his trust: "Let the abbot always remember that at the fearful judgment of God, not only his teaching but also his disciples' obedience will come under scrutiny." 122

Monastic legislation puts a premium on human example. At each step of the journey, monastics have those above them who model the virtues that will lead them into the mind of Christ. Observation of monastic superiors is constantly exhorted throughout the tradition; it is the experience of living with good guides that forms the cenobites, making them the strongest kind of monk, ultimately giving them the spiritual strength and training in order that some may reach the goal of being strong enough to live alone as anchorites.

Literary

This monastic emphasis on imitation led to particular attention to texts about people and their deeds. Scripture was mined for its positive and negative examples, extending an interpretive tradition that has its roots in Scripture itself, exemplified by Sir 44-50 and Heb 11. An array of Scriptural notables fill the pages of Benedict, Cassian and Ælfric: Abel, Enoch, Judas, Gehazi, Elijah, Josiah, Judith, Ananias and Sapphira, functioning as examples and counter-examples for monastics striving to grow into the stature of the great exemplar, Christ himself.

¹²⁰ RB 5.4. Fry, RB 1980, 187.

¹²¹ RB 2.4-5, 11-12. Fry, RB 1980, 73

¹²² RB 2.6. Ibid.

The search for exemplars was not the only way that early medieval monastics sought to imitate the Scriptures, though. Benedict is clear that the monastic life is an embodiment of what Scripture enjoins: "What page, what passage of the inspired books of the Old and New Testaments in not the truest of guides for the human life?" The Prologue of the Rule adapts the wisdom form of a father's exhortation to his son; it is an impressive deployment of Scripture that includes a line-by-line run through a portion of Ps 34 and another through the beginning of Ps 15. This Scriptural pastiche is placed as a cry in the mouth of Christ calling the prospective monk into his service through the embodiment of the Scriptures. After concluding with the parable of the builders on sand and rock from the end of the Sermon on the Mount, Benedict summarizes his exhortation: "With this conclusion, the Lord waits for us daily to translate into action, as we should, his holy teachings." These teachings are further enumerated in the fourth chapter, "Tools for Good Works".

In addition to Scripture, monasticism was nurtured and spread through the developing art form of Christian hagiography. Athanasius' Life of St Antony had an incalculable effect on the growth of monasticism. In the West, four other lives quickly grounded both the shape of monasticism and the conventions of the hagiographical genre; Jerome's lives of Malchus, Hilaron, and Paul of Thebes, and—especially central to the growth of Gaulish monasticism—Sulpicius Severus's Life of St Martin. Lives of saints became an enormously popular form of literature. Lapidge reports that "C. W. Jones once estimated that some 600 [saint's lives] survive from the period before 900."¹²⁵

¹²³ RB Prol.35. Fry, RB 1980, 163.

¹²⁴ This chapter was discussed above in Chapter 1.

These lives fulfill two important functions in the monastic milieu. First, they present examples of virtue and saintliness for imitation. Second, they continually remind their readers and hearers of the end result of such imitation—they record the miracles performed by God through the saint before and after death. Through their power of efficacious intercession on behalf of the living the glorified saints extend divine power into the world of the living, participating in and advancing the eschatological consummation in a manner different but not ultimately dissimilar from Cassian's vision of Christ made complete in his Body.

Some modern readers seeking historical data or the flavor of local medieval life from saint's lives are sorely disappointed to find generic and stereotyped topoi repeated throughout the genre. They impart little data for historical use. In order to accomplish the mimetic and theological functions, the genre followed certain prescribed conventions, conventions that seem strange to us now. The tradition provides a basic template:

the saint is born of noble stock; his birth is accompanied by miraculous portents; as a youth he excels at learning and reveals that he is destined for saintly activity; he turns from secular to holy life (often forsaking his family) and so proceeds through the various ecclesiastical grades; he reveals his sanctity while still on earth by performing various miracles; eventually he sees his death approaching and, after instructing his disciples or followers, dies calmly; after his death many miracles occur at his tomb. Of course any number of variants is possible within these basic frameworks; but the framework itself is invariable. 126

¹²⁵ Michael Lapidge, "The saintly life in Anglo-Saxon England," in The Cambridge Companion to Old English Literature, edited by Malcolm Godden and Michael Lapidge (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986), 243-263, 253.

¹²⁶ Lapidge, "The saintly life," 253. The outline for a passio or death by martyrdom is equally stereotyped but by this point in the life of the Western Church few martyrs were being made, Boniface and other northern missionaries being exceptions.

As a body of literature, these lives had a specific use in the community; during Chapter, ¹²⁷ the head of the community would read from the life of the saint on the day before his or her veneration that the monks might meditate upon the virtues of the saint throughout the coming feast. During the Night Office on the feast, the life—or a different version thereof—would be read as the main reading for one of the Nocturns. Thus, the presence of a life for any given saint remembered in the community's liturgical kalendar¹²⁸ was not optional—they were ecclesially necessary documents. As a result, the framework could be utilized even for saints about whom the hagiographer had only the most scant information: "[A]n anonymous monk of Whitby wished to honor with a vita the pope responsible for the conversion of the English; knowing little about Gregory the Great or miracles associated with him, however, he must ask his readers' indulgence if he simply praises the saint extravagantly, randomly assembling passages from Scripture, references to Gregory's writings, and some absurd fables."129 Thus, working from the basic framework and resorting to a handful of stock topoi a saint's life could be easily assembled for any one of the some 300 post-biblical saints venerated in an average Anglo-Saxon institution that would satisfy the liturgical and mimetic requirements of the genre while frustrating historians of a later age. 130

The mention of Scripture in the above life of Gregory the Great is significant. The construction of sanctity was an important function of these works and that construction had to conform to expectations: "It was the overall intention of any hagiographer to demonstrate that his saintly subject belonged indisputably to the universal community of saints, . . . It is not so much a matter of plagiarism as of ensuring that the local saint is seen clearly to

¹²⁷ See the section on the daily round in Chapter 3.

¹²⁸ This is a standard technical term that serves to distinguish a liturgical listing of occasions to be observed from the more standard use of the term. As medieval months were reckoned according to the Roman system of counting down to the kalends, nones, and ides, most kalendars begin with the word "Kalends" in a large, brightly colored, distinctive script indicating the first day (the kalends) of the month of January.

¹²⁹ Rachel S. Anderson, "Saint's Legends," in A History of Old English Literature, edited by R. D. Fulk and Christopher M. Cain (Maldon, Mass.: Blackwell, 2005), 87-105, 90. The particular life mentioned is found in Betram Colgrave, ed. and trans., The Earliest Life of Gregory the Great (Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1968).

¹³⁰ Lapidge, "The saintly life," 247. Lenker records lectionary entries for 155 sanctoral occasions, many of which commemorated multiple saints.

possess the attributes of, and to belong undoubtedly to, the universal community of saints." The virtues, trials, and especially miracles are very often drawn directly from Scripture. Not only does this create a continuity of sanctity, but it also reinforces that the Christian life in general and the monastic life in particular was understood as an everincreasing progress in enacting the Scriptures—not only enacting its commandments and precepts, but even receiving the same graces that biblical personages enjoyed. The citation and appropriation of Scripture in hagiography melded imitation of the saints with imitation of the Scriptures, all of it ultimately pointing to the imitation of Christ who is the source and pattern of both the saints and the Scriptures.

Summary

Mimesis plays a role in both early medieval monastic culture and the culture of the academic study of the New Testament. In the latter it is a more or less temporary arrangement designed to impress upon graduate students the skills and habits of thought necessary to become insightful, creative scholars grounded in the scientific interpretive tradition. For the former, mimesis is a life-long process intentionally cultivated and built into the essential fabric of monastic life. Superiors, equals, and the blessed dead are all candidates for imitation but the preeminent models are the figures of Scripture and of those the pinnacle is Christ.

LITERARY CULTURES

Before a discussion of how the two cultures interact with texts, the stark technical differences between these cultures must be addressed. Modern biblical scholars have massive advantages over their medieval counterparts. The printing press was a quantum leap forward; not only can books be mass-produced so that individuals can have substantial libraries and even small institutions can own thousands of volumes, but the text in each run of a book is identical. Mass-produced Bibles of the same version all contain the same text. Furthermore, a common system of chapters and verses ensures identical references to any biblical passage. Such a system highlights and typically even footnotes minor variations where Hebrew or Vulgate verses-numberings differ from the standard scheme. With the advent of computer-aided research tools, texts of all kinds can be parsed and searched with ease, placing at the fingertips of scholars amazing capabilities for locating cross-references and accessing primary and secondary sources. In addition to these textually-centered technologies increases in productivity provided by innovations like electric lighting, central heat, word processing, and world-wide telephony further separate the two cultures.

¹³¹ Lapidge, "The saintly life," 254.

By way of contrast, early medieval monastics had only the texts that could be copied by hand on expensive and laboriously prepared materials. Too often modern academics dismiss as plagiaristic scribal behaviors that functioned contextually as strategies for preserving and transmitting texts that would otherwise have been lost. Monasteries were supposed to have enough books that each monk could have one book for edifying reading during Lent and for the daily practice of lectio, this still does not imply a large number. In discussing the size of Anglo-Saxon monastic libraries, Lapidge writes:

Aldhelm's library at Malmesbury, Alcuin's at York, the library at tenth-century Winchester used by Lantfred, Wulfstan, and Ælfric, and that at Ramsey used by Abbo and Byrhtferth, may have contained more (but probably not substantially more) than 100 volumes each. Other libraries whose contents we know from surviving inventories—for example those at eleventh-century Worcester and Peterborough—were smaller still. The typical Anglo-Saxon ¹³² Indeed, medieval marginalia sometimes contains complaints written by the scribes concerning the poor ink, lighting, vellum, and the physical pain caused by hours of writing under such conditions.

¹³³ A further discussion of the "plagairism" charge appears later in this chapter.

¹³⁴ See RB 48.15-16.

¹³⁵ See RB 48.4-5, 10, 13, 22.

monastic library probably owned fewer than fifty volumes, all of which could be housed in a simple book-chest. 136

The primary advantage of monastic readers was the practice of lectio; due to this method of slow and meditative reading, monastics would have memorized far more of the biblical, patristic, and liturgical texts they read than most modern readers. The sheer volume of biblical references and allusions scattered through monastic writings of all types bear witness to the degree to which the biblical text was assimilated.

New Testament scholarship and early medieval monastic culture are both fundamentally literary ways of life, yet their purpose in reading the same texts is very different. Nowhere is this more plainly seen than in examining the very foundations of their interpretive projects: their hermeneutical frameworks and their basic approaches towards the New Testament compositions as found in introductions to the New Testament. Ælfric serves us in perfect stead as a voluminous author and teacher who has bequeathed both a clearly delineated hermeneutical framework and a text which may be regarded as the first introduction to the Bible ever written in an English language. Modern scholarship is ably represented by Werner Georg Kümmel, the author of an authoritative history of modern New Testament scholarship which details the emergence of the modern hermeneutical framework and the editor of a classic scholarly introduction to the New Testament. Comparing the works of these two scholars illuminates both the methods and aims of these earnest interpreters of the biblical text.

The Hermeneutical Framework

The Academic Study of the NT

Just as Ælfric is an example of one reader among many, Werner G. Kümmel is one representative voice among the many voices of modern New Testament scholarship.

¹³⁶ Michael Lapidge, The Anglo-Saxon Library, (Oxford: Oxford University, 2008).

Particularly influential in certain German and American scholarly traditions, Kümmel is a fine representative of modern historical criticism and its approach to the New Testament. Kümmel's The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of its Problems details the steps that lead to the achievement of the consistently historical hermeneutic that stands at the heart of the modern academic study of the New Testament.

Several characteristics emerge as streams that on their own make progress towards but are not themselves the consistently historical hermeneutic. The three most important that interweave with one another are a literal sense of the text, the historical particularity of the text's creation and the historical particularity of the text's reference. Several sub-factors like the need for a critical edition, a bracketing of the Old Testament, and reading the text apart from ecclesiastical tradition are integral to these three core characteristics.

Kümmel presents a narrative that wends from "The Prehistory"¹³⁷ and the first stirrings towards a scientific hermeneutic beginning in the Reformation to "The Decisive Stimuli"¹³⁸ rooted in the challenging of the textus receptus and the jolts given to the Protestant dogmatic perspective by the free-thinking Deists. It is not until the achievements of Michaelis and Semler that he can discuss "The Beginnings of the Major Disciplines of New Testament Research."¹³⁹ However, at this point the key fields of scientific study begin to take shape including the Synoptic problem, biblical theology, the emergence of a truly historical consciousness, and, finally, a hermeneutic oriented not towards theological or eternal truth but historical truth. The good efforts of Semler and Michaelis are extended by Strauss and Baur who usher in a properly scientific hermeneutic described in the section fittingly entitled "The Consistently Historical Approach to the New Testament."¹⁴⁰

¹³⁷ Kümmel, History, 13-39.

¹³⁸ Kümmel, History, 40-61.

¹³⁹ Kümmel, History, 62-119.

¹⁴⁰ Kümmel, History, 120-205.

While Kümmel communicates the process that unfolds and ultimately achieves the consistently historical hermeneutic, he does not express the boundaries of this hermeneutic in a succinct formulation within his historical survey. His introduction to the New Testament, however, is prefaced by an initial section wherein he describes the genre of the enleitung:

The scientific discipline of "introduction to the New Testament" treats the historical questions of the origin of the NT writings, their collection, and the textual tradition of this collection. It presupposes the existence of the NT canon, in which the church of the second to fourth centuries collected those writings which were supposed to serve as the norm for the church's preaching and to be read in worship. The science of introduction is, accordingly, a strict historical discipline. Through the clarification of the historical circumstances connected with the origin of the individual writings, it furnishes to [exegetical] exposition the necessary presuppositions for the understanding of the writings in their historical individuality. Through the study of the origin and the contents of the collection, it provides the secure historical basis for the question about the doctrinal contents of the NT. As a historical science, the science of introduction makes use of the methods of historical research and for that reason it is a thoroughly justified goal of such research to treat the investigation of the circumstances surrounding the origin and of the literary connections of the individual writings as the oldest part of a "history of primitive Christian literature," and the elucidation of the origin of the canon as part of church history and of the history of dogma.141

In this assessment, Kümmel alludes to two other parts of the study of the New Testament—exposition and doctrinal study—and he explicitly limits his topic to the "science of the introduction." Nevertheless, what he presents as introduction seems also to be his understanding of the major part of the field overall. The composite picture that emerges from Kümmel's two major works is a fundamental emphasis on the consistently historical hermeneutic.

¹⁴¹ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 25.

This consistently historical hermeneutic restricts itself to the books of the New Testament, eschewing the quest for a unified understanding of all of Scripture in favor of isolating the temporal and historical factors that created the writings of the New Testament. The New Testament text contains ideas that illuminate religious thought and practice at the end of the first century of the Common Era, enabling the reader to uncover what beliefs were held by members of Christian communities and how those ideas developed within the span of time contained within the writings. Fundamentally, therefore, the academic study of the New Testament is properly placed within the history of ideas. Works deserve attention to the degree that they promulgate new ideas or at least significant variations on ideas. Therefore the book of Jude is of more intrinsic importance to the investigator than Second Peter because the latter text replicates without substantial development most of the ideas of the former. The letters of Paul are more useful to the investigator seeking a holistic picture than the Catholic Epistles because Paul's letters represent a larger sample from the hand of a single author revealing at greater length and in greater detail the beliefs of the time.

Because of their contents, compositions are able to communicate valuable data about early Christianity. By comparing and contrasting the ideas within the text, different circles or schools of thought may be determined. By examining how these circles of thought utilized common ideas or religious themes, the relation of these groups to one another can be reconstructed, illuminating the history of the early Christian movement and its component parts as these circles related to each other and to the Early Imperial world.

¹⁴² Rather than grouping the New Testament with the Old Testament, the scientific study of Scripture aligns it with the literature of the late second temple period.

The final goal, the telos, of the consistently historical hermeneutic as Kümmel presents it is precisely the reconstruction of the religious beliefs of the earliest Christians, the social factors that influenced them, the inter-relations between the various groups and their relationships with religious competitors, particularly the other strands of Second Temple and post-Second Temple Judaism as well as the emerging Gnostic movements and Hellenistic mystery religions against which early Christians defined themselves.

Based on such hermeneutical premises, the Introduction to the New Testament that Kümmel inherited and bequeathed to subsequent generations of scholars follows this understanding of the texts. It begins with an introductory chapter that sets up the foundation of modern New Testament studies. He provides bibliography for the major tools for critical study: Editions of the Greek NT; Dictionaries, Concordances, Biblical Lexicons; Grammars; Hermeneutics; Complete NT Commentaries; and Bibliographies. He then gives a short introduction that defines the discipline as an historical science, and offers a brief history of the discipline focused on the development of the critical introduction concluding with a bibliography of critical introductions. From that point he engages the New Testament writings in canonical order from the perspective of the historical science.

As an example, Kümmel's discussion of the Gospel of Matthew falls within the general category of "The Origin of the New Testament Writings." It appears within the first division of the section for "The Narrative Books" which contains "The Synoptic Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles." Although the first gospel in the New Testament, Matthew is not addressed until the fourth part of this division, behind a definition of the genre, "Gospel and Gospels," an explication of "The Synoptic Problem," and "The Gospel of Mark." The context displays Kümmel's emphasis on literary and historical issues. Thus, the section begins with the literary question of genre, moves to the historically conditioned question of composition, then to the historically prior gospel—Mark—before arriving at Matthew.

¹⁴³ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 21-25.

¹⁴⁴ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 25-26.

¹⁴⁵ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 26-29.

Kümmel's section on Matthew follows a set pattern paralleled by his sections on Mark and Luke. The Matthew portion addresses Contents, Literary Character and Theological Purpose, Place and Time of Composition, and Author. By page count, the second section on Literary Character and Theological Purpose receives twice as much attention as the other sections combined.

The term "Matthew" can be ambiguous—does it refer to a text or an author? On occasion Kümmel uses the term to refer to the literary composition ("The question of the organization of Matthew in the purport of the evangelist cannot be answered with certainty"). ¹⁴⁶ Overwhelmingly, though, he uses the term to refer to the otherwise anonymous ¹⁴⁷ author of the gospel. Throughout Kümmel's analysis, Matthew is present as an author and editor who takes the Markan framework and "fundamentally transforms" it. Matthew is an individual (rather than a text) who has "fondness," ¹⁴⁸ who "considerably improved Mark's Greek," "abbreviated," "augmented," "undertook changes in content," and otherwise reworked his Markan material. ¹⁴⁹ These changes are in service of his "real theological aim"—an overall editorial purpose. ¹⁵⁰ The majority of the section on Matthew lays out the editorial changes that differentiate the book from its Markan source, incorporate the Q material and address the nature of the special M material. Kümmel stays very close to the technical details of the text itself.

While Kümmel speaks of Matthew as an individual—it can't be said that the evangelist quite rises to the level of a character—Kümmel's construction is rooted within his ¹⁴⁶ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 75.

¹⁴⁷ In the brief section on "Author," Kümmel dismisses the traditional identification of the author with the apostle as "completely impossible" (Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 85). The evidence of the gospel allows us only to identify him as "a Greek-speaking Jewish Christian who possibly had rabbinic knowledge" (ibid.)

¹⁴⁸ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 75.

¹⁴⁹ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 76.

¹⁵⁰ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 77.

historical project. He does not attempt to psychologize or explain Matthew's editorial work by appeals to personality or temperament. Rather, the few motives and characterizations that Kümmel presents proceed from observations about the nature of Matthew's editorial activity. So, Kümmel will make some biographical and educational suggestions: Matthew had rabbinic training because we see evidence of patterns that resemble rabbinic material here not found in Mark or Q. ¹⁵¹ He also makes a suggestion about the nature of socio-historical situation in which Matthew was writing: as "a Greek-speaking Jewish Christian" writing in Antioch or Syria. ¹⁵³ Thus, Kümmel demonstrates a solid historical approach in his discussion of the evangelist. He works with an individual, not a text, who functions as an author and editor but who can only be known through a careful analysis of the text that he has left and the departures that he has made from his sources.

Early Monastic Medieval Culture

Reading through Ælfric's corpus, an attentive reader notices that he continually returns to certain themes grounded in an overarching narrative that holds together the Scriptures, world history, and the eschatological fulfillment. The numerous bits and pieces scattered throughout his writings point towards several texts that lay out a narrative of this kind. Virginia Day's 1974 article "The influence of the catechetical narratio on Old English and some other medieval literature" correctly identified the place of Ælfric's core narrative within its patristic and early medieval trajectory.

Day begins by defining the identifying characteristics of what she refers to as the "catechetical narratio":

In medieval literature there are a number of examples of a type of writing which provides an outline of Christian cosmology and Christian history. These works deal, usually briefly, with the following: [1] God and his creative powers, [2] the creation, [3] the fall of the angels, [4] the creation and fall of man, [5] biblical history, [6] the redemption, [7] Christ's life, [8] the crucifixion, [9] the descent into hell, [10] the resurrection, [11] the ascension, [12] the second coming and last judgement. The subjects vary somewhat; the fall of man and his redemption are of central importance, and some outline versions are reduced to these essentials. 154

¹⁵¹ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 85.

¹⁵² Ibia

¹⁵³ Kümmel, Introduction to the NT, 84.

Day identifies the originating source of this outline—particularly taking creation as a starting point and emphasizing redemption—as Augustine's De Catechizandis Rudibus. While correct in highlighting the importance of this patristic work, she misses a yet more basic source, indeed, Augustine's own: the creeds. Of her twelve common elements only three—elements 3, 4, and 5—are not contained within the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds.

Day helpfully identifies a number of works that implement Augustine's catechetical pattern: Avitus of Vienne's Libelli de Spiritalis Historiae Gestis, Hrabanus Maurus's De Fide Catholica—a reorganization of the Hiberno-Latin Altus Prosator, Odo of Cluny's Occupatio, the Old Irish Voyage of Snegdus and MacRiagla, the poem Saltair na Rann, the prose version of the same in the Lebar Bec, ¹⁵⁶ (Ps.-)Boethius's De Fide Catholica, and a handful of sermons—both freestanding and incorporated into martyrologies. ¹⁵⁷ The two most important early medieval adaptations of Augustine's work are Martin of Braga's De Correctione Rusticorum and Pirmin's Scarapsus. ¹⁵⁸

Turning to the narratio's effect on Old English literature, Day mentions Cædmon's hymn, the Junius Manuscript's "Genesis" and "Christ and Satan" but focuses upon three OE sermons: the anonymous Vercelli XIX, Ælfric's De Initio Creaturae (ÆCHom I, 1), and Wulfstan's Bethurum VI—a reworking of Ælfric's piece. All three bear the imprint of Martin

¹⁵⁴ Virginia Day, "The influence of the catechetical narratio on Old English and some other medieval literature," ASE 3 (1974): 51-61, 51. The numeration of the elements is my own for ease of reference.

¹⁵⁵ The Latin text is in PL 40.308-348; an English translation is in NPNF¹ 12.277-314.

¹⁵⁶ Day, "catechetical 'narratio'," 54.

¹⁵⁷ Day, "catechetical 'narratio'," 53

¹⁵⁸ Ibid

¹⁵⁹ Day, "catechetical 'narratio'," 54-55.

of Braga's work; the first and last show clear signs of Pirmin's as well. Ælfric's, though, is more independent from its sources. ¹⁶⁰ In short, Augustine's catechetical suggestions were widely influential in early medieval Europe and in Anglo-Saxon England; when compared with other catechetical works, Ælfric's contributions are largely typically rather than exceptional.

Ælfric presents his version of the narratio in a number of his writings:

Ælfric produced other versions of the Christian cycle. There is one at the beginning of his Letter to Sigeweard¹⁶¹ and another at the beginning of his Letter to Wulfgeat. His Hexameron also contains similar material; although its structure is that of the six days' work [of creation], it closes with a reference to the redemption and eternal life and a passage of exhortation... There is also evidence that the Letter to Sigeweard, the Letter to Wulfgeat and the Hexameron all lean on the De Initio [CH I.1] in diction and phraseology. The De Initio was Ælfric's most complete version; it is as if all the latter accounts presuppose the existence of this basic one. ¹⁶²

Day also mention's Ælfric's works De Creatore et Creatura and De Sex Etatibus huius Seculi. ¹⁶³ Furthermore, verbal and thematic parallels may be found throughout Ælfric's sermons for the Annunciation of Mary, ¹⁶⁴ Christmas, ¹⁶⁵ and the Memory of the Saints. ¹⁶⁶ Truly grasping this narrative and its contours is essential to apprehending Ælfric's program.

Day touches on the crucial importance of this narratio. Since her intention is to place Ælfric's appropriation within a larger trajectory, she does not explore further but states:

¹⁶⁰ Both Day and Godden—citing Day—emphasize the freedoms that Ælfric takes with his sources. While they both acknowledge his significant debt to Augustine and Martin of Braga, close verbal parallels are few and tentative. Day, "catechetical 'narratio'," 57; Malcolm Godden, Aelfric's Catholic Homilies: Introduction, Commentary and Glossary (Early English Text Society, supplementary series, 18; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000), 8. ¹⁶¹ Actually, the letter as a whole is largely structured by this narrative—certainly by the logic of the narrative. See the discussion of the letter below.

¹⁶² Day, "catechetical 'narratio'," 57, 58.

¹⁶³ Day, "catechetical 'narratio'," 57 n.9.

¹⁶⁴ ÆCHom I, 13.

¹⁶⁵ ÆCHom II, 1.

¹⁶⁶ ÆLS (Memory of Saints).

The catechetical background explains why he chose the De Initio to open his Catholic Homilies: the catechetical sermon is the traditional introduction to Christianity. In the Letter to Sigeweard the narratio serves as an introduction to a discussion of the bible and Ælfric's various translations from it. The Augustinian background makes clear how apt this is. Augustine considered that the catechetical narratio should provide the essential narrative and message of the scriptures interpreted for the ignorant: the narratio is to lay down the guidelines for the understanding of scripture. Accordingly, before allowing his reader to proceed to what he conceived of as the dangerous terrain of the bible itself, Ælfric took the opportunity to clarify the correct message to be derived from it. In the Letter to Wulfgeat also the context of the narratio is clearly 'catechetical': Ælfric prefaces his advice on how to live the moral life with a brief outline of the Christian cycle, exactly as Augustine had recommended that the narratio—as well as his use of some similar material in the Hexameron—has the aim of providing a framework for the unlettered, of placing each particular point of Christian doctrine in relation to the pattern of the whole. ¹⁶⁷

Day rightly identifies the function of this narratio: to fix the framework of the Christian story in the minds of its hearers. Her point may be extended—especially given the verbal reminiscences and allusions in Ælfric's other writings—that it securely embeds itself within the worldview of the preacher and interpreter as well. Indeed, the Letter to Wulfgeat states that its summary of the narratio is in fact a remembrance of what Ælfric had expounded on his actual visit to Wulfgeat's hall, Ylmandune. This framework is the hermeneutical lens through which he views the biblical text and thus it deserves sustained attention.

The heart of the narrative is the story suggested by the creeds. The lead characters are briefly introduced before the opening of the narrative proper: The Holy Trinity, one God in three persons, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit is eternal and pre-existent. The Trinity—primarily through the Father and the Son—created the world, all things seen and unseen. The Holy Spirit holds all things in life and forgives those who truly repent.

¹⁶⁷ Day, "catechetical 'narratio'," 59.

In the process of creation, God created ten angel hosts.¹⁷¹ The tenth host, led by Lucifer, rebelled against God on account of Lucifer's pride¹⁷² and were cast from heaven.¹⁷³ This host exists now as the demonic order.¹⁷⁴ In order to replace this host,¹⁷⁵ God created humanity—first Adam, then Eve—and placed them in the garden,¹⁷⁶ presenting the tree in the center of the garden as a test of obedience and loyalty—the loyalty that Satan and his host lacked.¹⁷⁷ Through the devil's trickery Eve was deceived¹⁷⁸ and humanity disobeyed God's command,¹⁷⁹ receiving dismissal from the garden and death as a consequence.¹⁸⁰

¹⁶⁸ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 6-9, 17-21. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,178, 179; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 30-44. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 17; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 8-19. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 1-2; ÆHex ll. 64-95, Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 38-41; ÆLS (Memory of Saints) ll.1. Skeat, Lives of Saints, 336.

¹⁶⁹ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 9-13, 21. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,178, 179; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.28-34. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 17; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 23-25. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 2.; ÆHex ll. 34-57. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 36-7; ÆLS (Memory of Saints) ll.2-4. Skeat, Lives of Saints, 336.

¹⁷⁰ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 40-44. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 17; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 20-22. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 2; ÆHex ll. 57-63. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 38.

¹⁷¹ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 22-26. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 179; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 51-54. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 18; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 26-33. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 2; ÆHex ll. 96-106. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 41-2.

¹⁷² ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 29-43. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 179-180; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 67-101. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 18-20; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 34-38. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 2; ÆHex ll. 306-316. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 56-7.

¹⁷³ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 43-45. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,180; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 101-5. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 20; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 39-45. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 2; ÆHex ll. 299-305, 317-318, 320-322. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 55-7.

¹⁷⁴ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 26-27, 34-39, 57-62. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,1-179-80; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 105-7. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 20; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 46-49. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 2-3; ÆHex ll. 319. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 57.

¹⁷⁵ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 62-64. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,180-1; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 113-6. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 20; ÆHex ll. 324-328. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 57-8.

¹⁷⁶ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 64-73, 86-94. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,180-1; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 108-13. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 20; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 54-55. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3; ÆHex ll. 348-357, 427-433. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 59-60, 65-66.

¹⁷⁷ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 74-83. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,181; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 116-7. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 20; ÆHex ll. 434-435. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 66.

¹⁷⁸ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 125-39. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,183; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 117-8. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 20-1; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 56. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3; ÆHex ll. 449-452. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 67.

¹⁷⁹ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 139-42. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,183; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 118-9. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 21; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 57. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3; ÆHex ll. 453-455. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 67.

From Adam came Noah who had three sons;¹⁸¹ after God led them through the flood, 182 the eldest of the sons, Shem, was the ancestor of the Hebrews 183 whom God rescued from Egypt¹⁸⁴ and to whom the Law was given. ¹⁸⁵

From the Hebrew people God chose the Blessed Virgin Mary¹⁸⁶ from whom Jesus was born incarnate by the Holy Spirit. 187 Jesus performed a great many miracles that the people might believe that he was the Son of God. 188 He taught that humanity must believe rightly in God, be baptized, and demonstrate faith with good works. 189 Fundamentally, though, he came for the redemption of humanity. 190 The devil used Judas to incite the Jews to kill Jesus¹⁹¹ and he was crucified.¹⁹² After the crucifixion he was buried¹⁹³ and descended into hell where he conquered the devil¹⁹⁴ and freed Adam, Eve, and their descendants.¹⁹⁵ He

¹⁸⁰ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 142-54. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,183-4 ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 119-20. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 21; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 58-9. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3; ÆHex ll. 456-478. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 67-9.

¹⁸¹ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 181-190. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,185; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 158-61. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 22.

¹⁸² ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 191-202. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,185; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 150-156, 195-197. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 22, 24; ÆLS (Memory of Saints) ll. 22-24. Skeat, Lives of Saints, 338.

¹⁸³ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 222-231. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1,186-7; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 239-241. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 25.

¹⁸⁴ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 232. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 187; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 325-59. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 29-30.

¹⁸⁵ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 232. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 187; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 366-70. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 30; ÆHex ll. 16-29. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 34-5.

¹⁸⁶ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 236-41. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 187; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 891-2. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 54; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 60-4. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3; ÆHex ll. 507. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 71; ÆLS (Memory of Saints) ll. 106-109. Skeat, Lives of Saints, 344.

¹⁸⁷ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 241-5. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 187.

¹⁸⁸ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 253-61. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 187-8; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 900, 913-7. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 55; ÆLS (Memory of Saints) ll. 134-141, 184-188. Skeat, Lives of Saints, 346, 348-50.

¹⁸⁹ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 261-4. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188.

¹⁹⁰ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 245-246, 270-273. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 187, 188; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 918. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 56; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 65-66. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3; ÆHex ll. 509. Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 71; ÆLS (Memory of Saints) ll. 110-112. Skeat, Lives of Saints, 344.

¹⁹¹ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 265-75. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188.

¹⁹² ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 275-6. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 917-8. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 55-6; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 67. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3.

¹⁹³ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 276-7. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 68. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3.

¹⁹⁴ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 277-8. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 70. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3; ÆHex II. 508, Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 71.

¹⁹⁵ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 278-80. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 71-73. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3.

arose from the dead on the third day¹⁹⁶ and rejoined his disciples, teaching them that they must go throughout the earth, teaching and baptizing.¹⁹⁷ On the fortieth day he ascended bodily into heaven and was seated at the right hand of the Father.¹⁹⁸ He will come at the end of time on the clouds with great power and will raise all souls that they may be judged.¹⁹⁹ The wicked will be cast into eternal fire; the righteous he will bring into the heavenly kingdom.²⁰⁰

Ælfric's fundamental hermeneutical outlook is that Scripture is the written record of a great eschatological epic that arcs seamlessly from creation to the great consummation. This view presents several exegetical implications. Scripture as whole is understood with reference to itself—the OT and NT are read together and mutual interpret one another. The dominant tools for interpreting Scripture are fundamentally literary and are the same as those used for interpreting other monuments of literate culture: grammar and poetics. To the early medieval mind, Scripture not only utilized grammatical and poetic techniques but defined them. Scriptural usage that diverged from Classical standards was not only acceptable but beyond critique. Furthermore, the identification of these tools means that the interpretation of Scripture is a learned art form that requires both skills and intelligence beyond the scope of the normal congregant.²⁰¹

Second, as a result of this literary character of Scripture, the Scriptures and their contents were subject to literary rules and devices rather than historical inquiry. As a result, literary strategies for meaning-making like prolepsis (foreshadowing), allegory, and typology

_

¹⁹⁶ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 280-1. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 918-9. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 56; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 69. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3; ÆHex ll. 510, Crawford, Exameron Anglice, 71.

¹⁹⁷ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 281-4. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188.

¹⁹⁸ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 284-7. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188-9; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 919-20. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 56; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 74-77. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3.

¹⁹⁹ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 287-91. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 189; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 920-1. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 56; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 7-79. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 3.

²⁰⁰ ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 291-3. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 189; ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 922. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 56; ÆLet 6 (Wulfgeat) ll. 80-84. Assman, Angelsächsische Homilien, 4; ÆLS (Memory of Saints) ll. 88-93. Skeat, Lives of Saints, 342.

²⁰¹ See Ælfric's preface to Genesis that displays his reluctance to translate Scripture into English lest the simple be misled by an overly literal understanding of the Law. Furthermore, his sermons abound with warnings that the depths of the Scriptures are beyond the ken of his listeners.

are not only possible but quite necessary. Furthermore, these were applied not only to the biblical text but also to the events narrated by the text. Strategies like typology discovered clues and hints in isolated pericopes and events that point to the larger drama of redemption being played out repeatedly on many levels within the pages of the divine text.

Ælfric deploys this kerygmatic framework within several different contexts. While the same core proclamation appears each time, Ælfric shifts its emphases and the surrounding, contextualizing material, to suit his pedagogical, catechetical, or homiletical needs. As a result, the theology of the kerygma is not rigid or static, but adapts itself to different situations.

Through these adaptations, worship, faith and obedience form an interlocking set of concepts for Ælfric's subsequent reading of the OT. Abraham, of course, exemplifies all three: "he worshipped God with his whole heart and the Heavenly God spoke to him often on account of his great faith...God Himself promised him that through his kin all humanity should be blessed for his great faith and for the obedience that he had towards God." Israel's temporal peace was dependent upon praise and earnest worship of God. The summarized teachings of Jesus during his earthly ministry gather together ritual action, belief, and obedience as well: "[Jesus] said that no man may be healed unless he rightly believes in God, is baptized, and demonstrates his belief with good works."

Ælfric's emphasis on obedience particularly as filtered through exemplary characters of the Old and New Testaments and from the history of the Church locate his work squarely within the mimetic hermeneutic of traditional monasticism and, at the same time, enable it to speak to the Anglo-Saxon lay milieu. He follows in the footsteps of Cassian and Benedict,

_

²⁰² He wurpode God mid ealre his heortan, & se heofonlica God him gelome to spræc for his micclan geleaf... God silf him behet, þæt þurh his cyn sceolde eall mannkynn beon gebletsod for his micclan geleafan & for his gehirsumnisse, þe he hæfde to Gode. ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 249-252, 257-264. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 26. See ÆLS (Memory of Saints) ll. 25-27. Skeat, Lives of Saints, 338.

²⁰³ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 429-436, 507-519. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 33, 37-8.

²⁰⁴ Cwæð þæt nan man ne mæig beon healen buton he ryhtlice gelyfe on god. & he beo gefullod. & his geleafan mid godum weorcum geglenge. ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 261-3. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 188.

appealing to the same sainted examples, in his construction of a semi-Pelagian theology of salvation through imitation of Christ and his holy ones in belief and in deed.

Furthermore, this hermeneutic drives his fundamental approach to the biblical texts and to the Gospels. The impulses present in this kerygma are made explicit in Ælfric's lengthy Letter to Sigeweard.²⁰⁵ This letter melds Ælfric's kerygma with a treatise on the Bible and its interpretation that is the earliest surviving English-language introduction to the Bible. Ostensibly, the letter is a two section work comprising an introduction to the Old Testament (ll. 1-838) and an introduction to the New Testament (ll. 839-1274). Its unifying vision, though, alternates between the order of the canon and an explication of the eight ages of history that constitute the period from creation to the blissful existence of the righteous after the last judgment. Functionally, this letter accomplishes five tasks: 1) it communicates a sense of the whole canon through a listing of books and facts about them, 2) it serves as an index of Ælfric's English language treatments of Scripture up to the time of the writing, 3) it subsumes the canon within the apocalyptic battle between Christ and Satan, 4) it identifies the Scripture's import as prophesying and foretelling Christ's redemptive acts throughout history, and 5) it offer exemplars for imitation in the ongoing struggle. ²⁰⁶

On one hand, the treatise looks like a modern introduction to the Scripture in that it works systematically through the biblical canon, concerning itself with matters of authorship, contents, and basic interpretation. The Old Testament portion covers the Pentateuch,²⁰⁷ the historical books to the Exile,²⁰⁸ the Psalms,²⁰⁹ the Solomonic wisdom books,²¹⁰ the apocryphal wisdom books,²¹¹ the Prophets,²¹² and the later canonical and apocryphal

_

²⁰⁵ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB).

²⁰⁶ The latest work on the Letter to Sigeweard dates it towards the end of Ælfric's career, between 1003 and 1009. Larry Swain, "Ælfric of Eynsham's Letter to Sigeweard: An Edition, Commentary, and Translation" (Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago, 2008), 46.

²⁰⁷ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 137-398. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 21-32.

²⁰⁸ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 399-495, 504-25. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 32-36, 37.

²⁰⁹ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 483-6. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 36.

²¹⁰ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 495-503. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 36-7.

²¹¹ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 552-63. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 39-40.

²¹²ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 564-712. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 40-45.

historical books²¹³ (including Job²¹⁴).²¹⁵ In the presentation of these books, Ælfric notes the author whenever possible, explains the Latin name of the book where necessary, ²¹⁶ then gives a summary of the contents. These may be brief²¹⁷ or lengthy. ²¹⁸ Lastly, interpretive comments aid the reader in linking these books to Christ either through typological interpretation of narrative, ²¹⁹ typological etymology, ²²⁰ or direct prophecy. ²²¹ In addition, Ælfric does not miss the opportunity to offer contemporary political commentary in his exposition by highlighting OT exempla of kings, leaders, or women who took up arms against pagan armies, ²²² apparently a jibe at the ineffectual English policies in regard to the Viking invaders. ²²³

11:

²¹³ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 726-97. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 46-49.

²¹⁴ Jerome's preface to Job—undoubtedly one of Ælfric's sources either directly or through Isidore's Ety. 5—gives no sense of the genre of the work. This rather irascible work prefers to speak of the meter, to excoriate Greek OT translations other than the Septuagint, and to criticize those who would rather purchase or produce deluxe manuscripts than feed the poor. His famous (singular) reference to "uncialibus" appears in this preface. ²¹⁵ Of the books of the OT, Lamentations alone is not mentioned directly though the passage "[Jeremiah] lamented greatly the sins of his people just as his book tells us" (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 619-20. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 42) may be an oblique reference to it.

 ²¹⁶ Deuteronomy (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 373-4. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 31), Proverbs (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 495-6. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 36), Ecclesiastes (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 498-9. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 37), and Song of Songs (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 500-1. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 37).

²¹⁷ The summary for the book of Ruth, for instance, occupies a mere three lines (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 445-8. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 34).

²¹⁸ The longest summary and interpretation by far is for Genesis—175 lines long (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 137-312. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 21-28). Exodus, by comparison, occupies almost 60 (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 313-70. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 28-30).

²¹⁹ Adam (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 166-71. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 22-3.), Eve (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 171-5. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 23.), Cain and Abel (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 175-8. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 23.), Abraham and Isaac (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 263-9. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 26.), Joshua (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 415-21. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 32-3.), David (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 473-83. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 35-6.), Song of Songs (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 500-4. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 37.), and Jonah (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 675-81. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 44-5.).

²²⁰ Typological etymologies are given for Seth (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 178-82. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 23.), Noah (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 195-205. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 24.), an epithet of David (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 472-3. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 35.), and for Solomon (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 504-6. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 37.).

²²¹ The Psalms (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 483-486, 693-705. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 36, 45.), Isaiah (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 569-597. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 40-1.), Jeremiah (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 611-6. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 42.), Ezekiel (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 631-40. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 43.), Daniel (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 648-55. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 43.), the Twelve Prophets in general (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 666-82. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 44-5.), and Habakkuk in particular (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 682-8. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 44.) are all identified or quoted as speaking directly about Christ.

²²² See especially his comments on Judges (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 427-45. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 33.), Saul (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 455-63. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 34-5.), David (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 464-71. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 35), the good and bad kings of Judah (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 507-18. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 37-8), Judith (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 772-780. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 48) which contains the

The New Testament introduction treats the evangelists, ²²⁴ the apostolic authors and their epistles, ²²⁵ the Pauline corpus ²²⁶ including not only Hebrews but also the epistle to the Laodicians, ²²⁷ Acts, ²²⁸ and Revelation. ²²⁹ This section does not have the extensive exegetical remarks that the OT section had. However, Ælfric does pause after his section on the Pauline epistles to summarize the interpretive center of the gospels, catholic, and Pauline epistles as love of God and obedience through good works.

Lastly, in his concluding matter, Ælfric takes up the topic of the canon as a whole.²³⁰ The two testaments, like the two seraphim in Isa 6, speak with a single voice "concerning Christ's humanity and concerning the Holy Trinity in true unity."²³¹ Like the seraphim, the unity of the testaments is further demonstrated in their endless praise of God in both words and works. 232 Ælfric divides the canon into a total of seventy-two books which mirror both the number of nations who scattered from Babel and the number of apostles that Jesus sent out into the world as a further demonstration of the unity of the canon.²³³ very explicit admonition: "[This book] is also translated in English in our fashion to set an example for people that you should defend your own land with weapons against an attacking army" (ibid), and a lengthy exposition on the Maccabees (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 781-838. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 49-51).

²²³ Compare the contemporary lament in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle on the martyrdom of Archbishop Ælfheah at the hands of Viking raiders: "All these disasters befell us through bad policy, in that [the Vikings] were never offered tribute in time nor fought against; but when they had done most to our injury, peace and truce were made with them; and for all this peace and tribute they journeyed nonetheless in bands everywhere and harried our wretched people and plundered and killed them" (Dorothy Whitelock, ed., English Historical Documents: c. 500-1042, 2nd ed. (London: Eyre & Spottiswoode, 1979), 244). Moreover, see the famous Sermon of Lupus to the English Nation by Ælfric's correspondent Archbishop Wulfstan of York who particularly decries the practice of stripping churches to pay tribute to the Danes.

²²⁴ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 862-90. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 52-4.

²²⁵ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 925-37. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 56.

²²⁶ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 938-49. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 57.

²²⁷ Laodicians is transmitted in a handful of Latin early medieval biblical manuscripts (See Berger). As Ælfric does not mention the work in any other extant context, it is impossible to say if the letter was included through knowledge of the apocryphal work or through the reference to such a letter in Col 4:16. (The Laodician textual variant in the title of Ephesians was not transmitted in the Latin tradition.) See Thomas N. Hall, "Ælfric and the Epistle to the Laodicians," pages 65-84 in Apocryphal Texts and Traditions in Anglo-Saxon England, edited by Kathryn Powell and Donald Scragg (Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2003).

²²⁸ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 974-9. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 58-9.

²²⁹ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 1010-4. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 61.

²³⁰ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 1154-1184. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 68-70.

²³¹ be Cristes menniscnysse & be bære halgan brinnysse in sodre annysse. ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 1155-1156. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 68.

²³²ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 1160-1163. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 69.

²³³ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 1176-1184. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 69-70.

Thus, in one sense, the contents of Ælfric's Letter to Sigeweard anticipate the expectations that modern scholarship places on the genre of einleitung or critical introduction. The foremost questions treated include the identity of the biblical authors, the temporal context within the history of Israel (particularly for the OT sections), the chief contents of the works, basic interpretive strategies, and even attention to the relationships between the parts of the canon and the whole canon. Certainly modern scholarship would disagree with many of Ælfric's findings in this regard, but the scope is familiar.

Despite these familiar aspects, Ælfric's framework is his kerygma in general, an eschatological periodization of history in particular, and a catechetical focus that continually draws him away from a tight focus upon the biblical text. The organizing effects of Ælfric's kerygma on the Letter to Sigeweard are immediately apparent. He begins not with the Scripture but with the Trinity, ²³⁴ and immediately diverges from the biblical narrative to present a lengthy extra-canonical account of the fall of Satan. ²³⁵ As Ælfric continues, he moves in historical order—an order that agrees with the canonical order as far as 2 Chronicles. As he moves through the periods of history, he follows the standard apocalyptic device of dividing time into a set of ages. ²³⁶ As the ages run in their courses they draw more inevitably to the time of the Last Judgment. Already we are in the sixth age, which will end with the Second Coming of Christ. The idea comes, once again, from Augustine's De Catechizandis Rudibus. ²³⁷ As a result, his scheme is fundamentally historical in as much as it follows the scope of the ages, rather than following the canon proper.

_

²³⁴ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.36-50. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 17-8.

²³⁵ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.51-107. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 18-20.

²³⁶ The first six ages are clearly temporal, the last two are somewhat extra-temporal. Age 1: from Creation to Noah; Age 2: from Noah to Abraham; Age 3: from Abraham to David; Age 4: from David to Daniel; Age 5: from Daniel to Christ; Age 6: from Christ to the Last Judgment. Age 7 is, essentially, a stasis age wherein all who have died rest until the Last Day (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.1186-1191. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 70). Age 8 is the single eternal day of the Resurrection life. (ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.1191-1194. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 70).

²³⁷ The idea also appears in Augustine's Tract. in Ioh. 9.6 and subsequently in Bede's Hom I.14 where he expands upon the theme.

Despite the historical framework, Ælfric is not working with an understanding of history as an assembly of factual events; history is a subset of moral philosophy. As a result, Ælfric seems just as or more interested in authors than in books. The section on the four main prophets²³⁸ indeed focuses more on the authors than the books. He goes into detail on how each of the prophets died.²³⁹ The inclusion of the Sibyls among the prophets²⁴⁰ is traditional; here Ælfric follows Isidore.²⁴¹Again, as Ælfric presents the NT he spends a substantial set of lines discussing the evangelists—but never discusses the gospels or the differences between them. The evangelists themselves absorb his attention. The apostles, like the prophets, are remembered not only for their writings²⁴² but also for their martyrdom.²⁴³ Finally, in one of the most unusual features of the letter, Ælfric leaves the theme of the Scriptures altogether and recounts a legend concerning John taken from Rufinius's Chronicon.²⁴⁴ Apparently, establishing the character of the writer is just as important as recounting the contents of his work.

The focus on authors brings Ælfric's catechetical intention back into view. Throughout the work, Ælfric has repeatedly referenced the importance of good works. Indeed, obedience to God's commands—interpreted as faith revealed in good works and in the orthodox worship of the Triune God—is Ælfric's touchstone for interpreting Scripture. He makes this especially clear in this writing by inserting two interpretive summaries—one at the beginning serving the OT and one in the midst of the NT section. After his initial greeting and before his usual description of the Trinity, Ælfric offers introductory remarks concerning God's will:

²³⁸ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.569-665. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 40-44.

²³⁹ Note that all of the prophets die for their faith but one who lives to an exceedingly ripe old age (Daniel).

The same pattern holds true for the apostles where the sole peaceful death at an extended age is John.

²⁴⁰ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 712-25. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 46.

²⁴¹ Isidore, Ety.8.8. PL 82.309C-310B.

²⁴² ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.925-937. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 56.

²⁴³ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 979-1009. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 59-60.

²⁴⁴ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.1039-153. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 62-3.

God loves good works, and he wishes to have them from us for it is truly written concerning him that he is blessed by his own works just as the psalmist thus sang concerning him: Sit gloria Domini in seculum seculi, letabitur Dominis in operibus suis; that is in English: "Let there be glory to our Lord forever and ever; our Lord is blessed in his own works." Thus says the prophet. The Almighty Creator manifested himself through the great works which he worked at the beginning, and he willed that creation would see his joys and dwell with him in glory in eternity under His rule [underpeodnisse] ever obeying [gehirsume] him, because it is very perverse that worked creatures should not obey [gehirsume] him who shaped and worked them.²⁴⁵

Thus good works are placed in direct connection with the obedience due the overlord who is the creator of all things. The two concepts are inseparable.

The same connection appears in Ælfric's summary comments on the unity of the NT witness. Directly citing John 14:15, 23-24, Ælfric comments: "Here we may hear that the Savior loves the deed more than the smooth word. The word passes away; the deed stands." Citations of James 1:22-23a, 1 John 3:18, and Titus 1:16 demonstrate for him the consonance of the various sections of the NT on this pivotal point. That is, loving Jesus and the God who sent him is demonstrated in obedience to his commands, good works; the apostolic witness agrees that true belief is obedience exemplified by action.

The biblical characters and authors that Ælfric introduces reinforce his point and provide examples of faithful action.²⁴⁷ A key concern within this letter is the responsibility of the noble class—the warrior class—to the nation. In addition to consistently drawing attention to the defense of Israel from heathen armies, a concluding section at the end of the letter addresses the responsibilities of the three main class of society, the working/tilling class, the praying class, and the ruling/fighting class.²⁴⁸ Without all three classes performing their specific function, society will collapse like a stool with a bad leg.²⁴⁹ Naturally, the work of the warriors is the protection of the other two classes.²⁵⁰ The thematic repetition leads a reader to conclude that Ælfric is encouraging Sigeweard not just to general good works but to a quite specific one—taking up arms to defend his people from the Viking raiders. Here Ælfric demonstrates his ability not just as a generic catechist but as a savvy advisor as well, blending religious instruction with political suggestion.

²⁴⁵ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.18-28. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 16.

²⁴⁶ Her we magon gehiran, þæt se Hælend lufað swiðor þa dæde þonne þa smeðan word: þa word gewitað & þa weorc standað. ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll.956-957. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 57-8.

²⁴⁷ In this regard, a further examination of the parallels between the Letter to Sigeweard and ÆLS (Memory of Saints) would prove most profitable. ÆLS (Memory of Saints) is a general treatise on the saints but spends a great deal of time on biblical saints in particular.

Ælfric's treatment of Matthew within the Letter to Sigeweard is, like Kümmel's, a treatment of the author more than the text. In doing so he discusses Matthew twice but each time he is part of a larger group—the first time grouped with the other evangelists, the second time with the apostles. Ælfric's description of the apostles is commonplace, and repeats the well-known material from Jerome's commentary on Matthew that served as a preface to the gospels in most early medieval gospel-books:

Four gospels were written concerning Christ's life. One was written by Matthew who was with the Savior, his own disciple following him in this life. He saw his wonders and wrote them in this book in the Hebrew tongue after Christ's passion in the land of Judea that they might believe in God. He is the first evangelist in the canon. [He then introduces the other evangelists.] These are the four rivers from a single well-spring which go widely from Paradise over God's people. These four evangelists were formerly signified as Ezekiel saw them: Matthew in a man's form, Mark in a lion's, Luke in a calf's, John in an eagle because they signified these significances. Matthew wrote concerning Christ's humanity...²⁵¹

²⁴⁸ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 1207-1217. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 71-2.

²⁴⁹ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 1217-1220. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 72.

²⁵⁰ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 1212-1217. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 72.

²⁵¹ ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 862-867, 880-885. Crawford, OE Heptateuch, 52-54.

There is no discussion here of sources, of editorial work, or of the shaping of traditional material. Ælfric does address the target audience, language of composition, and a central theological theme—the humanity of Christ. He does not, however, produce any evidence for these claims. He presents the traditional wisdom which flowed from Eusebius to Jerome to Isidore. After this introduction, he summarizes the gospel story found in the works of the four evangelists, speaking of Christ's Incarnation, slaughter of the innocents, selecting the apostles, the miracles, and lastly the crucifixion and resurrection; no differentiation between sources is made.

The next discussion of Matthew comes in Ælfric's description of the Acts of the Apostles but it serves to transmit the historically suspect material more commonly associated with the apocryphal Acts than the canonical Acts. Ælfric writes of Matthew, "Matthew preached in the land of Ethiopia where there are Ethiopians and the king slew him, not converted but faithless." Ælfric's sermon for the Feast of St Matthew (CH II.34) takes this as a jumping-off point and after an initial exegesis of the call of Matthew, includes a passio that tells of Matthew's martyrdom in Ethiopia.

Thus, Ælfric also treats Matthew as an individual rather than a text. Ælfric's Matthew is almost entirely independent of the text that bears his name. No references are made to it or citations used. Ælfric's interest is not in Matthew as an editor, but Matthew as a participant within the eschatological epic described by Scripture. He is a witness—a witness of the human life of Jesus as his disciple, and a witness in that he testified concerning the Christian faith up to and including martyrdom. Matthew transmits knowledge about the events of salvation history and also participates within it, ensuring the spread of the Gospel and therefore the kingship of Christ.

²⁵² ÆLet 4 (SigeweardB) ll. 998-1000. Matheus bodode on Ethiopian lande, þæt synd þa Silhearwan, & se kining hine ofsloh, na se gelyfeda, ac se ungeleaffulla. Crawford, Sigeweard, 60.

Summary

Ælfric and Kümmel are both fine representatives of their culture's attitude towards the biblical text and to Matthew in particular. Kümmel understands the study of the New Testament to occur within the framework of the history of ideas. As a result, he attends carefully to the ideas about religion in the first century that can be determined from the pages of the biblical text. In addressing Matthew, he studies Matthew's editorial activities to determine his sources, how he departed from Mark, and how he shaped a new message and the social context into which such a message might best fit.

Ælfric understands the Scriptures to be the record of the great eschatological epic describing the enmity between God and Satan and laying forth the redemptive work of Jesus Christ. Within this framework, Matthew is important because he is a participant and a witness. His gospel records both the words and works of Jesus witnessed by Matthew, but Matthew himself is also an exemplum of a committed preacher and teacher who is willing to spread the message of Christ's redemption to distant nations even if it costs him his life.

Both authors are faithful to the projects of their respective micro-cultures and in that fidelity differences between the two are put into relief. Even in the cases where they share an approach—treating "Matthew" as a person rather than a text, for instance—they show themselves to be operating from fundamentally different starting places.

THE CRITICAL CONVERSATION

The Modern Situation

Introduction

All four of the commentaries with which I am working participate in the critical conversation concerning the scientific study of the New Testament. Two of them—Luz and Davies and Allison—not only stand within it but participate directly in the continuation of the conversation. The other two—Boring and Hare—stand within it just as surely as the other two but serve a different function. Their primary purpose is to mediate the insights of the critical conversation to those who stand outside of it: they offer insights to clergy and laity who have not been trained and inculturated into the scientific study of the New Testament. As a result, they offer an intermediary position, engaging two worlds: the scholarly and the (broadly-construed) pastoral.

The Critical Commentaries

Luz and Davies and Allison operate in a similar fashion. Surveying the tradition, they identify the major interpretive options for a given passage, discussing which scholars and schools took certain directions. Then, weighing these options, they choose one or another of these paths, supporting their choices with evidence that then adds to this critical conversation. An important part of this process, then, is identifying the contours of the conversation—noting who is included and who is not, and which interpretive philosophies are broadly accepted and which are not. The central virtues needed to satisfactorily participate within this endeavor are a broad knowledge of the voluminous secondary literature of the field, the ability to accurately synthesize the work of other scholars, grouping them into meaningful categories, then offering persuasive insights—preferably original insights—as to why one interpretive option or cluster of options are to be preferred over others. In regard to these tasks, both Luz and Davies and Allison are consummate professionals. Their abilities and credentials are validated by their invitation to contribute to two major critical commentary series, a certification of their scholarly worth and a statement of their authority to contribute to the continuing conversation.

One indication of the character of the tradition in which they stand is their use of language. The critical conversation is conducted in a formal and stylized dialect. English diction unfamiliar to outsiders is commonplace: words like "eschatological," "hermeneutic," and "chiastic" are used without explanation. Other words have a different meaning than their popular use: terms like "cult" and "miniscule" have different valences and meanings within the critical conversation. And on occasion, the language itself is not English as well: the authors expect a basic knowledge of Greek and Hebrew—sometimes Latin and Aramaic too—are expected and a sprinkling of German phrases is not unusual as well.

Ulrich Luz begins the preface to the first edition of his commentary with a reference to the "flood of secondary literature that increasingly proves to be more than a hindrance to scholarly communication" and that may keep "one from dealing with the text itself." An additional reference to the "immensely swollen secondary literature" also conveys the sheer volume of work that the critical conversation produces and that must be integrated to have a mastery of the tradition. ²⁵⁴

Luz refrains from sketching the contours of the modern critical conversation, but a number of names surface in both the preface to the German edition and the preface to the English edition: Hermann Dörries, Joachim Gnilka, Eduard Schweizer, Hans Weder, Axel Knauf, and Helmut Koester. For those in the conversation, these names on the whole identify a stream of German scholarship that is both historically grounded and interested in pastoral issues. He also helpfully adds a notice that defines the length of the tradition he will engage: "After the text [of Matthew] itself, I am probably most indebted to the church fathers and to the Protestant and Catholic exegesis of the sixteenth through the eighteenth centuries." Thus, he consciously includes pre-scientific considerations of the text into the boundaries of his conversation. The ten-page double-column list of short titles of commentaries, studies, and frequently cited articles reflects the array of predominantly German, English, Latin, and French sources that he has drawn upon and provides a ²⁵³ Luz, Matthew 1-7, xv.

²⁵⁴ Ihid

²⁵⁵ Luz, Matthew 1-7, xv, xvii.

²⁵⁶ Luz, Matthew 1-7, xv.

comprehensive list of conversation partners;²⁵⁷ a list of specific works engaged stands at the start of each pericope that he addresses.

Furthermore, on a typical page of his commentary a line dividing somewhere between a third and half the page denotes space reserved for footnotes, many of which either point to secondary sources or engage discussions held within the secondary literature. Other scholars are not visibly present in the text of his work above the line—but they certainly appear below it.

In terms of his purpose, Luz hopes that his work will not be solely academic:

I have written this commentary primarily for priests, pastors and teachers of religion. One wonders whether it will help them engage in an intensive conversation with the texts in their study or whether its length will actually keep them from such a conversation. I would rather have a response to this question than to read all the critical reviews.²⁵⁸

He acknowledges with the nod to critical reviews that his work stands securely in the scholarly tradition, yet he hopes that that it will include those who have only been introduced and not immersed in it: the clergy. The laity are here not in view.

Davies and Allison begin their preface with arguments against the two main objections against new commentaries: the current state of flux in biblical studies and the presence of sufficient commentaries. In overcoming these, they present a sketch of their view of the conversation. In addressing the first they write:

As it is important that each generation translate the Bible for itself, in its own idiom, so each generation should express its own interpretation of it. This will necessarily rest to a large degree on the work of previous generations. Any significant commentary will be an agent in the transmission of exegetical traditions: its wisdom accumulative. But each generation also brings its own peculiar insights to add to those of the past and helps to ensure that the Bible remains a living reality and not a static deposit.²⁵⁹

_

²⁵⁷ Luz, Matthew 1-7, xxviii-xxxvii.

²⁵⁸ Ibid.

This is a succinct statement that holds two virtues in tension—the transmission of knowledge and its increasing growth. The work of a "significant" commentary is to do both.

A list of contemporary commentaries features in their answer to the second objection. In framing their answer, they identify these works as conversation partners—but partners who fall short or at least are in need of further supplementation:

Willoughby C. Allen published his volume in this series in 1907, and A. H. McNeile's commentary in the Macmillan series appeared in 1915. These were on a large scale and based on a scrupulous scholarship. The recent work of Robert H. Gundry (1982) is massively learned and instructive but not a little idiosyncratic. There have also appeared, among others on a smaller scale, the commentaries by W. F. Albright and C. S. Mann, F. W. Beare, Floyd Filson and David Hill. The first of these was much criticized; and most of the others—admirable as they are, especially that of Professor Hill—were limited by the nature of the series in which they appeared, and the same applies to the English translation of Eduard Schweizer's influential commentary. On all these we have gratefully drawn as upon the countless, often excellent, monographs dedicated to the First Gospel. But in the conviction that the time is ripe for a fresh attempt at a large scale commentary on Matthew we accepted the invitation of the editors of this series.²⁶⁰

Here they have clearly identified the field of the English-language commentary tradition within which their work is located. David Hill is mentioned again as a reader of the manuscript.²⁶¹ A broader scope of their conversation is given in their exhaustive bibliographical listing of "Commentaries and Other Literature." This list of bare bibliographical data stretches twenty-seven pages and spans a wide range of writing on ²⁵⁹ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.ix.

²⁶⁰ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.ix-x.

²⁶¹ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.xi.

Matthew from Augustine and Pseudo-Anselm to Weiss and Wellhausen to Weder and Wink.²⁶²

In contrast to Luz, Davies and Allison reserve relatively little space for footnotes; only a fifth of the page at most is taken by them. However, names of other scholars and references appear throughout the body of the text. Rather than relegating interpretive differences and controversies to the footnotes, they are present within the text proper.

Although they do not go as far as to state it, their implied audience is certainly the scholarly community engaged in the critical conversation. The closest they come to a clear statement of purpose is their concluding remark: "Although we cannot be sufficient for this, our aim has been to be loyal to the tradition of disinterested and objective study in biblical criticism. We hope that this commentary will not prove unworthy of it." The catch-phrase "disinterested and objective" signals that the authors consider their work to be outside of dogmatic constraints imposed by any particular ecclesial body. It also situates them in a branch of the scholarly conversation not beholden to postmodernist philosophies that would call into question the possibility of achieving either objectivity or disinterest.

The Mediating Commentaries

The commentaries of Boring and Hare serve a different purpose. While the commentaries of Luz and Allison-Davies serve to synthesize, summarize, and move the critical conversation forward, the works of Boring and Hare serve to synthesize then mediate the conversation to outsiders not initiated into the conversation. Their commentaries are not primarily designed to speak to the community engaged in the scientific study of Matthew but to offer the fruits of scientific study to readers approaching the text from a position of faith who bring questions about the application of the text to the life of faith.

-

²⁶² Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.xxi-xlvii.

²⁶³ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.xi.

²⁶⁴ Ibid.

Both of these authors are scholars. They are trained in and stand within the critical tradition. While it is present throughout their work, it appears more or less silently. That is, while insights from earlier scholars appear, they are not quoted and footnoted as they are—as they must be—in the critical commentary tradition. Furthermore, these authors move beyond the community invested in the critical conversation. Because they speak to believers in their lives of faith, they frequently address issues and interpretations that could be summarily dismissed by the critical conversation because they do not flow from responsible exegesis as defined by the conversation. Too, their language is that of the people. Far fewer foreign words or terms appear and when they do they are suitable explained. Thus, these commentaries must mediate between critical and popular conversations and use the former to shed light on the latter in a manner comprehensible to those who live in the latter.

Again, these authors are every bit as indebted to the critical conversation as those who write the critical commentaries—the difference is that the debt is far less apparent due to the audience for whom they are written.

Eugene Boring offers an introduction that sets up his approach and introduces readers to the Gospel of Matthew and its world. He makes a few brief comments that serve to situate his interpretation but, in a sense, does not make as broad of a statement as the previously surveyed texts because of the nature of his work; rather than being free-standing, it is incorporated within a multivolume work and is bound within one volume with several other essays and a commentary on Mark. He is subscribing to a common form. The remarks that he makes, though, are both helpful and instructive.

The bulk of his introductory thoughts appear in one section. Boring writes:

This commentary attempts to help the modern reader interpret the ancient text with a view to its translation into contemporary meaning.

Historical study of the Gospel of Matthew is an ally in this task. Matthew was himself an interpreter, standing in the living streams of tradition, interpreting the meaning of the Old Testament into the new situation by looking back on the advent of the Christ, his ministry, crucifixion, and resurrection. In particular, Matthew stands in a Christian hermeneutical stream interpreting the sacred texts of Christian tradition revered in his church (namely, Q and Mark) and the M traditions unique to the Matthean community. Matthew's own interpretation represented in the Gospel of Matthew then entered into the living stream and has been the object of interpretation in the church for nineteen centuries. The contemporary interpreter stands with Matthew in this continuing stream, heir to Matthew's Bible and his Christian traditions (Q, Mark, M), the Gospel of Matthew itself, and the church's continuing interpretation of them all. Matthew is not the passive object of our interpretive work. He is a fellow interpreter who speaks not only to us, but also with us.

Boring's work is intended for popular consumption—anyone from a scholar to a New Testament neophyte is able to pick up his text, understand it, and find insights there. As a result, he constructs his categories around the issue of interpretation with care.

Christian denominations hold varying views towards the role of critical scholarship; while some embrace it whole-heartedly, others do so with reserve—some with a wary eye, while others reject it entirely. Some go so far as to suggest that relying on any form of prior interpretation is itself a sin against the Spirit and should be avoided. Negotiating these topics with sensitivity, Boring avoids potentially inflammatory terms like "critical" or "scientific." While the term "historical" appears, its use is ambiguous: readers do not know whether he is referring to a type of interpretation or to the historical reality of Matthew's interpretation which he takes up immediately afterward.

Instead, Boring chooses to focus on the role of "interpreter." He notes that Matthew was himself an interpreter of both the Old Testament traditions and the Jesus traditions that came to him through Mark, Q, and M. Matthew's own interpretation then became part of the "living/continuing stream" which flows through nineteen centuries to the reader. The only two people specifically placed in this stream are Matthew and the reader; Boring is implicitly present—as are the voices of the nineteen Christian centuries, not to mention those of the Old Testament centuries as well.

Interpreters of the New Testament occasionally appear both in the text and in footnotes, playing larger roles in the introductions to materials and in the excurses that Boring presents on particular topics. Both past and present interpreters appear, and there seems to be no hard and fast dividing line between those engaging in the scientific study of the text and its unscientific study, but the former are mentioned and cited much more frequently.

Douglas Hare signals his intentions in a preface that mirrors his editors; both prefaces that begin this text emphasize that it is not intended as a replacement of scholarly commentaries but is a supplement to them. Hare carves a niche for himself by identifying a gap between the critical commentaries and ecclesial leaders:

One of the deepest frustrations of ministers, seminary students, and lay Bible teachers is that scholarly commentaries so often provide answers for questions they are not asking and fail to address their basic questions concerning the theological meaning of the text. Scholarly commentaries are indispensible. The church has learned the hard lesson that there is no shortcut to meaning; if we are serious about discovering what the biblical authors are trying to say, there is no escape from the careful questioning undertaken by such studies. This commentary is by no means intended as a substitute for these. Its intention is to supplement their work by emphasizing what each passage means to Matthew and, by extension, to the modern church.²⁶⁵

-

²⁶⁵ Hare, Matthew, vii.

In a slightly different approach from Boring, Hare describes his work less as a direct mediation between the academic micro-culture and the ecclesial micro-cultures because he adds something that the scholarly commentaries do not contain—the theological meaning of the text.

In contrast to the other commentaries utilized, Hare uses neither footnotes nor endnotes. Interactions with or mediation of modern scholars occurs silently, with only a handful of exceptions. Even these exceptions (like an exegetical question suggested by a colleague on page 285) refer to other more popular treatments of the biblical text. The conversation is present but remains invisible to those not familiar with its contours.

Tucked in the back of the commentary is a bibliography divided into two sections: "For further study" and "Literature cited". The first is a half-page in length and refers to the main recent English-language treatments of Matthew (Davies and Allison appears here). The second is a page or so long and contains a smattering of articles, continental commentaries (Luz's work is listed here), monographs, and popular works. Again, the breadth and depth of the conversation is consciously limited.

The Early Medieval Situation

Ælfric's compositional technique and its relation to the tradition has been the focus of much study. The identification of his sources has continued over the course of a century. Förster's ground-breaking work laid a firm foundation for the study of the sources of the Catholic Homilies. Smetana's recognition of the importance of the early medieval homiliary tradition and the place of Paul the Deacon's homiliary in reference to Ælfric added much-needed nuance to these studies. Smetana's follow-up work on the homiliary of Haymo, the works of Barré and Grégoire on Carolingian homiliaries, Gatch's first major synthesis of the homiletic environment,²⁷¹ Clayton's survey of the homiliary tradition with particular attention to the late Anglo-Saxon milieu,²⁷² and Joyce Hill's work on Smaragdus²⁷³ have all led to a much better understanding of how Ælfric interacted with his source material and the means by which he accessed it. Godden's magisterial commentary painstakingly documents Ælfric's sources for the Catholic Homilies, often offering cogent suggestions from the homiliary tradition concerning how various pieces of patristic material came to Ælfric's attention. While, as Hill notes, more work remains to be done on the early medieval mediators of the tradition, it is now possible to speak intelligently concerning Ælfric's stated aims, implicit aims, and achievements in the Catholic Homilies with specific reference to the critical and popular conversations and the main lines of transmission.

²⁶⁶ Max Förster, "Über die Quellen von Ælfric's exegetischen Homiliae Catholicae," Anglia 16 (1894), 1-61.

²⁶⁷ Cyril Smetana, "Ælfric and the Early Medieval Homiliary," Traditio 15 (1959), 163-204.

²⁶⁸ Cyril Smetana, "Ælfric and the Homiliary of Haymo of Halberstadt," Traditio 17 (1961), 457-69. Shortly after the publication of this article, Barré properly identified this homiliary as the work of Haymo of Auxerre.

Early medieval monastic homilies also come forth from and in continuity with a critical conversation, albeit one with different rules and purposes than the modern scientific study of Scripture. In order to fully appreciate their contents, we must understand that this conversation took place within a very different context and for a very different purpose than the modern one. The context is the liturgy and the purpose is the consistent handing down of an authoritative tradition of interpretation.

Homilies were transmitted primarily in homiliaries. These books were collections of sermons where the order and textual context were determined by the rhythms of the liturgical year. Preeminently, they were books for use in liturgy. They could be used at Masses, in the Night Office, in Chapter, or in other liturgical functions outside of these three. Only after these purposes did they serve other functions, particularly as sources for holy reading in the monastic practice of lectio divina or as resources for study of the Scriptures,

²⁶⁹ H. Barré, Les homéliares carolingiens de l'école d'Auxerre, Studi e Testi 225 (Rome: Biblioteca apostolica vaticana 1962)

²⁷⁰ Reginald Grégoire, Les homéliaires du moyen âge, Rerum Ecclesiasticarum Documenta, Series Maior, Fontes 6 (Rome, 1966) and Reginald Grégoire, Homéliaires liturgiques médiévaux: analyse des manuscrits, (Bibl degli studi medievali 12; Spoleto, 1980).

²⁷¹ Gatch, Preaching and theology, 27-59.

²⁷² Mary Clayton, "Homiliaries and Preaching in Anglo-Saxon England," Peritia 4 (1985), 207-42.

²⁷³ Joyce Hill, "Ælfric and Smaragdus," Anglo-Saxon England 21 (1992), 203-237.

theology, and the Church Fathers. Clayton, in dialogue with McKitterick and Gatch, identifies three types of homiliaries based on function: those for use in the Night Office, those for private devotional reading, and those for preaching to the laity.²⁷⁴ She notes that these categories were quite flexible,²⁷⁵ however, and certainly Ælfric himself shows little discrimination between them when looking for source material, drawing from all three without regard.

Where the goal of the modern critical conversation is to move the conversation forward, the purpose of this critical conversation was not motion but stasis—handing on the authoritative teachings of the officially sanctioned tradition with as little deviation as possible. The complication of the situation, though, is that the teachings of the tradition do not apply to something static but to life itself. As a result, change was inevitable; the tradition and those who handed it on had the responsibility of making sure the fundamentals of the tradition were handed on in ways that engaged the emerging circumstances that impacted the often tumultuous lives of early medieval Christians.

Because of the nature of this conversation, an ongoing problem was identifying the proper participants. One important arbitrating mechanism was the council, gatherings of clerics that ranged anywhere from local synods attended by clergy of a certain region to the grand ecumenical councils attended by metropolitans, patriarchs, archbishops and bishops from across the known world. Often the business of these councils included consensus declarations on whether an author or the opinions of an author were in continuity with the apostolic faith as understood and interpreted by the gathered assembly.²⁷⁶ Lists of teachers and authors both approved and condemned were drawn up and circulated. Inevitably these lists were compared with one another and a general consensus formed in areas defining who was and was not part of the conversation.

²⁷⁴ Clayton, "Homiliaries and Preaching," 216.

²⁷⁵ Clayton, "Homiliaries and Preaching," 216-7.

²⁷⁶ Note the untextual nature of the criteria and the acclamations of Leo's Tome as recorded in the Acts of the Council of Chalcedon: "This is the faith of the fathers, this is the faith of the Apostles. So we all believe, thus the orthodox believe. Anathema to him who does not thus believe. Peter has spoken thus through Leo. So taught the Apostles. Piously and truly did Leo teach, so taught Cyril. Everlasting be the memory of Cyril. Leo and Cyril taught the same thing, anathema to him who does not so believe. This is the true faith. Those of us who are orthodox thus believe. This is the faith of the fathers" (NPNF, II.14). The criteria were not whether the consensus was most biblical but whether the teaching matched the faith of the apostles of which biblical fidelity was one component.

In addition, certain writers certified as trustworthy produced their own lists of trusted authors based on who they read and cited with approval in their works. Often these lists were implicit but sometimes they became explicit lists, detailing the lineages of students and teachers, their various writings, and the fate of them and their various writings. The Ecclesiastical Histories of Eusebius, Sozomen, Orosius and others performed this function. The polemical works against heretics by Eusebius, Pantaneus and others identified positions to be specifically rejected while Jerome's work, On Illustrions Men, continued by Gennadius upon Jerome's death, focused on authors and the texts they produced, approving and rejecting as needed.

While the Church attempted to maintain control over the boundaries of the conversation by regulating the contents of texts, one factor made true control impossible: the technology of textual transmission. Texts were transmitted by hand-made copies. However much the organizational levels of the Church attempted to centralize and control the conversation, it was unable to control the scribes.

This lack of control manifested itself in a variety of ways. One had to do with the problem of authenticity. A key document that now serves as a main primary source for our knowledge of received and condemned works, the Gelasian Decretal, is itself considered a forgery. While probably an authentic list produced by some synod or council, it is currently dated in the sixth century and therefore half a century after Pope Gelasius I, its purported author. Furthermore, identifications of authors sometimes depended on whatever headed a scribe wrote down. In one of the great ironies of the tradition, the extant texts believed to be by Pelagius survived destruction because of their ascriptions to Jerome.²⁷⁸ Pseudonymous works, whether falsely or simply incorrectly attributed, are common throughout the medieval period, the intent sometimes benign and accidental—and sometimes quite deliberate and deceptive. Codex construction played its part as well; packets of pages, individual leaves, and even quires could also be inserted into codices, further complicating issues of authorship and authenticity.

²⁷⁷ J. K. Elliott, ed., The Apocryphal New Testament (Oxford: Clarendon, 1993), xxiii.

Thus, despite efforts to the contrary, the borders of the critical conversation were sometimes more porous than the Church preferred, requiring constant vigilance against the introduction of distortions or heresies. Some times and places, of course, were more vigilant than others; for the most part throughout the early medieval north vigilance seems to have been the exception rather than the rule.

Gregory the Great (†604)

The main stream of the homiliary tradition can be said to begin with the chief patron of Benedictine life in the West, Pope Gregory the Great. A member of his congregation—most likely a member of his staff—recorded a number of homilies preached in the years 591-592.²⁷⁹ These were edited into a collection of forty Gospel homilies that received wide circulation in the medieval period. Based on contextual clues, these all seem to have been preached at public masses.

Although he may stand at the head of the Western homiliary tradition, Gregory would resist any suggestion that his writings are original. Rather, they draw broadly on patristic sources and are sometimes completely or partly adaptations of the writings of predecessors, particularly Augustine, Leo the Great, John Cassian and others; his homily for the First Sunday in Lent stands as a suitable example: his teaching on the temptation of Jesus contains traditional material found in Irenaeus, Origen, and others. Gregory's treatment, in fact, is most likely an adaptation of John Cassian's Conf. 5.6. Similarly, the trope that the one who turned water to wine could surely make bread of rocks had he chosen is likely indebted to Leo the Great's Hom 40.3. His numerological discussion of the timing of Lent corresponds with widespread ancient tradition. Thus, even here at the start of the chain, Gregory is passing along a self-consciously traditional reading of the text.

²⁷⁸ See D. W. Johnson, "Pelagius," pages 255-6 in vol. 2 of The Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, edited by John H. Haves (Nashville: Abingdon, 1999).

²⁷⁹ Gregory I, Forty Gospel Homilies, translated by David Hurd (CS 123; Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cisterican Publications, 1990), 1.

The Venerable Bede (†735)

The homiliary of Bede represents a second step in the movement of the homiliary tradition. Bede composed fifty sermons on the gospels arranged according to the liturgical year. He does not always appoint his homilies for particular occasions, but leaves some for general use in certain liturgical seasons. Comparing the series carefully with Gregory, a distinctive trend emerges; although Gregory was one of Bede's favorite authors, there is no overlap between the biblical texts treated by Bede and Gregory. Martin suggests plausibly that Bede produced his homilies intentionally to supplement and flesh out Gregory's cycle. Indeed, such a service would be in keeping with the rest of Bede's corpus: with regard to the gospels he wrote commentaries only on Luke and Mark—the two that lacked earlier authoritative patristic treatment.

Bede's style was fully patristic and he seamlessly interwove patristic material and his own interpretations derived by patristic exegetical techniques. An admirer of Augustine, Bede similarly produces thickly textured homilies that pull in a multitude of biblical references from across the canon and that focus on details of grammar and vocabulary. Unlike Augustine, whose style is rambling and often hard to follow, Bede's writing is tight and concise. While he was constantly in dialogue with and drew freely from Augustine, Gregory, and the other Fathers, Bede does not cite them directly in his homilies. (His commentaries are a different story; with a set of marginal references, Bede seems to have invented and pioneered the use of the source footnote.)

²⁸⁰ Bede the Venerable, Homilies on the Gospels: Book One: Advent to Lent, translated by Lawrence T. Martin and David Hurst (CS 110; Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1991), xvi.

Bede's homilies were clearly intended for the monastic Night Office and also as material for holy reading. Unlike Gregory, he includes no stories to provide local color, preferring to save those for his historical writings. Bede's audience, without a doubt, consisted of other monastics and the clergy. His homilies both participated in the critical conversation and were intended to remain within it. His choice of languages, his use of language, and his choice of styles²⁸¹ ensured that they would remain accessible to and for the benefit of those within the conversation.

Paul the Deacon (†799)

The next point in the tradition is the great homiliary of Paul the Deacon. Appointed by Charlemagne to pluck flowers from amongst the Catholic Fathers, ²⁸² Paul collected 244 items representing 125 liturgical occasions for the Night Office. Following the needs of the Night Office, Paul supplied most Sunday and festal occasions with two texts: a "sermo" for the second nocturn and an "omelia" for the third. ²⁸³ For his texts, Paul used homilies of the Fathers whenever possible, preferring works from Bede, Gregory the Great, Chrysostom, Jerome, and Augustine, and using passages from commentaries or other works when an appropriate homily was not available. For instance, of the fifty-six works attributed to Bede in the original collection, thirty-six are homilies and twenty are sections drawn from Bede's commentaries on the two less popular gospels, Luke and Mark.

²⁸¹ The style of the Ecclesiastic History is quite different from that of his homilies, inviting wider circulation. It is no surprise, then, that King Alfred the Great selected Bede's Ecclesiastical History for translation in his project to make key Latin-language texts available to those literate in English.

²⁸² Idque opus Paulo diacono, familiari clientulo nostro, eliminandum iniuximus, scilicet ut, studiose catholicorum patrum dicta percurrens, veluti e latissimis corum pratis certos quosque flosculos legeret, et in unum quaeque essent utilia quasi serum aptaret. (Wiegand, Homilarium, 16).

²⁸³ Smetana notes that there are 151 texts identified with the title sermo, 93 identified as omelia and that the distinction in the texts closest to Paul's original work seems to have accurately reflected the difference between the two. (Cyril Smetana, "Paul the Deacon's Patristic Anthology" in The Old English Homily & its Backgrounds, Ed. Paul E. Szarmach and Bernard F. Huppé. (Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1978), 75-97, 78. See the discussion of the difference between the two in the discussion of the Night Office in Ch. 3.

In each case, the source was identified so that those hearing would know from whom the teaching came and that it stood within the tradition. Inevitably, though, some of these attributions were incorrect. In fact, of the fifty texts attributed to Maximus, modern scholarship believes that only fourteen of them are actually his;²⁸⁴ of the nineteen attributed to John Chrysostom, only one is certifiably the work of Chrysostom.²⁸⁵ In addition, other material was added as the centuries passed²⁸⁶—and included more dubious material: many of the so-called Augustinian sermons added later were not written by Augustine.²⁸⁷

In one sense, Paul only transmits materials previously written by others and introduces no changes. In another, he exercises important editorial power by shaping the transmission of the tradition. Paul provided all of these texts with a new and uniform context—the Night Office. Each homily or commentary pericope selected by Paul was newly contextualized by the sermon paired with it and the responsories that would interrupt it two or three times in the course of its reading. Furthermore, he was, for all practical purposes, drawing the bounds of the critical conversation by what he included and excluded. For many monasteries with limited libraries, Paul's homiliary served as the primary repository of patristic wisdom. While more texts were added as the centuries passed, Paul the Deacon's homiliary passed into the heart of the tradition and became the source for the readings in the Roman Breviary. Like Bede, Paul the Deacon's work was intended to remain within the critical conversation as well as establishing its foundation. It is directed specifically to the clergy and monastics participating in the Night Office.

Neither the works of Gregory nor Bede were in any way "official." They were widely read and eagerly sought out, ²⁸⁹ but had no official standing. Paul the Deacon's work was ²⁸⁴ Smetana, "Patristic Anthology," 80.

²⁸⁵ Smetana, "Patristic Anthology," 83.

²⁸⁶ Migne's edition in PL 95 is representative of the expansion of the collection—it contains 298 texts, up 54 from the original scope.

²⁸⁷ Smetana, "Patristic Anthology," 82.

²⁸⁸ Smetana, "Patristic Anthology," 75.

²⁸⁹ The letters of Boniface constantly request copies of Bede's works from his English patrons and relatives.

different. The prefatory letter originally accompanying it documents Charlemagne's commission to Paul and authorizes the homiliary as the official text for the Frankish kingdom. Charlemagne demanded the establishment of a purified core tradition, and Paul's homiliary was an important aspect of that program of reform. The texts were to be strictly orthodox, coming from the recognized Fathers, and compiled by one whose orthodoxy and commitment to the tradition was known to the authorizing powers.

Smaragdus (†840)

The next logical step in the homiliary tradition is the "homiliary" of Smaragdus. While often described as a homiliary in the literature, it is something less than a homiliary: it is an exegetical help for the construction of homilies. Smaragdus treats 109 occasions of the liturgical year, providing each with three kinds of material: a catena of patristic material on the appointed Epistle, a patristic catena on the Gospel, and a brief statement on the harmony between the two. Like Paul the Deacon, Smaragdus draws entirely from patristic material. He offers original material only in the third section that describes the relationship between the readings. He also cites his sources, enabling those using the work to know from whom the interpretations were coming. Unlike Paul, he makes selections from patristic works and places them in silent conversation with one another, placing them side-by-side without further comment. He moves through the biblical texts in a line-by-line fashion, deploying patristic material as he goes—usually providing between one and three patristic excerpts per line or phrase. Also unlike Paul, Smaragdus's incorporation of the Epistle shows that he intended his work to assist with the biblical readings for Mass, since the Epistle is particular to the Mass and does not appear within the Night Office.

Applying the term "homiliary" to this work is not completely accurate, because it utilizes the literary form of the catena rather than the homily. Nevertheless, its shape raises questions about how it was used and what it may teach us about preaching in early medieval contexts. How much did the written text determine the content of the act of proclamation? Did a preacher simply read off what was on the page before him or does the text of Smaragdus represent starting points and options for the exposition of each verse, allowing the preacher with Smaragdus's text before him to pick and choose as he went, perhaps even translating or paraphrasing on the fly for non-Latinate congregations? Furthermore, what does this format suggest about how early medieval preachers understood the literary form of "homily" itself? The approach taken by Smaragdus dovetails with the notion of a homily as a set of verbal glosses that clarify the meaning of the biblical text rather than a methodical treatment of each line of the text²⁹⁰ or the exposition of a general theme extracted from the whole of the biblical passage.²⁹¹

Clearly, this work is intended to remain within the critical conversation. Like Paul's homiliary, it provides a foundation for the conversation by identifying the authors to be read and, moving beyond Paul, focuses patristic material on each line of the liturgically selected biblical texts.

Haymo of Auxerre (†855)

The homiliaries produced by the school of Auxerre, and especially Haymo of Auxerre, represent the next logical step beyond Smaragdus. In a telling footnote, Smetana refers to the work of Smaragdus as "brief excerpts from the Fathers," then to the homiliary of Haymo as "little more than judicious excerpts of the Fathers welded together into a continuous discourse." Like Smaragdus, Haymo uses multiple selections from the Fathers, but he chooses between various options, adds connecting material rather than presenting bare citations, and presents a new homily composed of patristic interpretations and insights cast into a new form. In short, Haymo's homilies may well be examples of what contemporary preachers did when they had a work like Smaragdus before them in the pulpit.

²⁹⁰ This is the patristic approach as seen in Gregory and Bede.

²⁹¹ This tends to be the default modern Protestant approach.

²⁹² Smetana, "Ælfric and the Early Medieval Homiliary," 181 n. 6.

Ælfric of Eynsham (†c. 1010)

The only complete manuscript of both cycles of the Catholic Homilies is Cambridge Gg.3.28.²⁹³ It contains more than just the homilies. It begins with a dedicatory letter to Sigeric, Archbishop of Canterbury, in Latin and English, contains the first cycle of the Catholic Homilies, another letter prefacing the second cycle, and the second cycle itself, as well as some additional brief catechetical materials. Ælfric's prefaces to his cycles of Catholic Homilies are important for understanding what Ælfric wanted to achieve and how he saw himself as a participant within the critical conversation of his day and a mediator of it. Both cycles have, in fact, two prefaces (for a grand total of four); each cycle received a Latin preface and an English preface. Broadly speaking, the content of Ælfric's prefaces was fairly uniform: "Each preface generally includes Ælfric's self-identification, his explanation for the creation of the work (often relating it to a request from an ecclesiastical or secular superior), an account of the work's sources and style, and remarks about its transmission."

Wilcox's studies of Ælfric's prefaces confirm that Ælfric utilized his prefaces to establish his authority by identifying his place within the conversation and its transmission and his reliability to mediate the tradition to those who only understand English. Wilcox states:

Ælfric's self-identification in the prefaces is a reflection of his attitude towards authority and his concern with maintaining a rigorous standard of orthodoxy. The opening of Preface 1b [the Old English Preface to CH I] is characteristic in the way that Ælfric uses his identity to validate the following work. He begins by identifying himself in terms of his ecclesiastical credentials and position: he is a monk and mass-priest (1b.1) and his current position is validated with respect to both ecclesiastical and civil authority through reference to Bishop Ælfheah and Æthelmær the thane (1b.2-5). The ecclesiastically-reliable persona defined in this first sentence is the identity which is opposed to error in the second sentence. Here further theological validation is provided (the decision to translate was 'I trust through God's gift' 1b.5-6) and the reason for translating is emphasized: 'because I saw and heard much error in many English books, which unlearned men through their ignorance reckoned as great wisdom' (1b.7-9). Ælfric has economically created a persona which can be relied upon to provide orthodoxy in opposition to the 'much error' usual 'in many English books.' Ælfric sometimes establishes his authority in other ways. In Preface 1a [the Latin Preface to CH I] the epistolary opening formula equates 'I, Ælfric' with 'a student of ... Æthelwold' (1a.1), a commonly recurring validation through association with the important Benedictine reformer. Further validation is provided in Preface 1a by the naming of a range of sources,

²⁹³ Designated by Clemoes as "K." Godden and Pope both retain Clemoes's manuscript sigla.

²⁹⁴ Jonathan Wilcox, Ælfric's Prefaces, (Durham Medieval Texts 9; Durham: University of Durham, 1995), 67.

Thus the English preface warns against heresies in other English books, suggesting—accurately²⁹⁶—that many theologically suspect writings exist among English materials and stand outside of the proper lines of tradition and transmission. As a monk, mass-priest, and client of both Bishop Ælfheah and Æthelmær, Ælfric is a reliable source of orthodox material in English. The Latin preface provides more detail and is intended for those familiar with the critical conversation. Only those who understand the language will understand the proofs that Ælfric offers there—he is the student of Æthelwold and cites the proper patristic sources.

patristic and Carolingian (1a.4 and 12-15). A final guarantee of authority is provided by the appeal to Archbishop Sigeric to correct 'any blemishes of malign heresy or dark fallacy'

(1a.36-40): the work which survives such correction must be reliably orthodox.²⁹⁵

_

²⁹⁵ Wilcox, Prefaces, 68-9.

²⁹⁶ The Blicking and Vercelli books, the only two major surviving collections of homilies before Ælfric contain Old English translations of condemned works including the Visio Pauli and the Apocalypse of Thomas, about which more will be said in chapter 5.

Citing the patristic sources explicitly places Ælfric within the critical conversation. He writes to Sigeric that he has translated materials from "Gregory, Augustine, Jerome, Smaragdus and also Haymo." Thus, Ælfric identifies both the major patristic sources he used and the early medieval homiliaries in which he found them; Hill has argued convincingly that the absence of Paul the Deacon from this list is due to Paul's homiliary circulating without the prefatory documents that identify its editor, not an uncommon state of affairs among English manuscripts of Paul's homiliary.

This list matches what Ælfric puts forth in the homilies themselves. Typically right after the translation of the Scriptural text, he identifies a patristic author who has guided his interpretation. Within the Catholic Homilies, Augustine, Gregory, Bede, and Haymo are most often identified as his sources.

Ælfric also invokes patristic authors whenever he needs to bolster a decision made in favor of orthodoxy. For instance, in his second homily for the Assumption of the BVM, he specifically warns against untoward speculation with a patristic appeal:

If we tell more concerning this feast-day than we read in holy books which were set down by God's direction then we will be like those dwolmen [foolish men, heretics] who write many false narratives according to their own direction or through dreams; but the faithful teachers, Augustine, Jerome, Gregory, and whatever others, cast them down through their wisdom. There are, nevertheless, dwollic [foolish, erroneous, heretical] books both in Latin and in English, and ignorant people read them.... Let everyone cast away the dwollic falsehoods which lead the incautious to destruction, and may everyone read or listen to the holy teachers who will guide us to the kingdom of heaven, if we are prepared to hear it.²⁹⁷

The three Fathers from the preface return here as well as the central arbiters of orthodox teaching.

-

²⁹⁷ CH II.29, ll. 119-33. Translation from Wilcox, Prefaces, 28.

Many of Ælfric's prefaces speak of his work as translations from Latin sources. These statements are intended as further guarantees that the material is reliable. However, Ælfric's use of the term "translate" (interpretatio | awendan) turns out to be different from its normal contemporary meaning.

The modern term 'translation', however, is inadequate for conveying the range of medieval practice, since it suggests rendering content as closely as possible from one language to another. Ælfric's practice is often closer to the modern sense of 'adaptation' or 'interpretation' entailing the transmission of Latin learning into English. . . .

I know it is possible to translate words in many ways', Ælfric observes at Preface 3a.10. He explicitly points out that his practice is not confined to the narrowest sense of transferal from one language to the other; rather he repeatedly describes his translations as not word for word but sense for sense (Prefaces 1a.9-10, 29-30, 5a.21-22, 8e.5-8). Such a formulation has a long tradition: he is probably drawing on Jerome's statement about biblical translation, which was, in turn, derived from classical tradition.

Other aspects of Ælfric's description of his translation technique make clear that the process is far from literal. He describes his translations as both abbreviating and rearranging his sources (Prefaces 1a.28-33, 5a.21-26), and he attaches comments on the plainness of his style and the orthodoxy of his content to his process of translation (Prefaces 2a.8-12, 3a.10-11, 5a.21-26, 1a.33-35, 36-38, 2a.22-24). He makes it clear that a literal transfer from one language to another would be counter-productive: "He who translates (awent) or he who teaches from Latin into English must always arrange it so that English may have its own way, otherwise it is very misleading to read for those who do not know the way of Latin." (Preface 4.96-99)²⁹⁸

-

²⁹⁸ Wilcox, Prefaces, 63-4.

Thus his own statements about his work demonstrate a consciousness of the importance of the translating process and a concern to present material in such a way that the orthodox meaning is clear. In practice, this includes not only translation but a significant amount of editorial work as well.

Thanks to Godden's magisterial commentary that meticulously identifies that patristic material that Ælfric wove together into his homilies, we now have a much better idea of Ælfric's range as an interpreter, editor, and author. While he derives much of his authority from his self-presentation as a patristic translator, Godden reveals that the degree to which he is a faithful interpreter of his patristic sources depends entirely upon the homily under consideration. Ælfric most often departs from the patristic text when he moves to engage the popular conversation. He does this both to explain something either in the text or source that would not be clear to an Anglo-Saxon audience and to engage mistaken readings or opinions in his environment. Even when he departs from his sources, though, he remains within a patristic and orthodox framework. That is, he tends to be just as orthodox when he goes off-book as when he remains close to his sources.

Thus, Ælfric participates fully within the critical conversation of the early medieval world in that he works with the Latin texts of the orthodox Fathers of the Western Church and the early medieval editors who collected and arranged their exegetical insights in accordance with the liturgical year. However, his intention was to serve as a mediator between the monastic micro-culture and the larger English-speaking macro-culture. Distressed at the heresies²⁹⁹ found in the materials offered to those outside of the monastic micro-cultural conversation, Ælfric's life-work—of which the Catholic Homilies represent a central pillar—is to transmit the Christian orthodox of the Latin books into a language and style accessible to all.

²⁹⁹ An examination of one such heresy will be discussed in chapter 5.

Summary

Conventional wisdom suggests that early medieval exegesis is derivative at best and plagiaristic at worst. I suggest that this criticism is overly harsh for two reasons: first, it judges early medieval exegesis on a set of criteria alien to the culture. If the purpose of the early medieval conversation had been the generation of new insights upon the biblical text then it would indeed be guilty as charged. But the conversation itself existed for a different purpose. It sought not to create new data but to preserve insights from being lost through neglect, heresy, losing touch with Christian experience, or destruction—a danger made all the more real by the technological limits of manuscript production. No doubt early medieval monks, like some current Christian micro-cultures, would accuse the modern academic micro-culture of an insatiable lust for exegetical novelties and a disconnect between exegetical possibilities and their application to the Christian moral and spiritual life.

Second, the judgment seems blind to the fundamental character of critical conversations. That is, a modern critical commentary like that of Luz or Davies and Allison could stray close to the line of being called "derivative" quite easily. We recognize, however, that the charge of being derivative is directly related to the degree to which a work is rooted in the critical conversation and indebted to its predecessors; "derivative" is the shadow side of being "informed" and "engaged" in the ongoing conversation.

In summary, the modern American academic micro-culture and the early medieval English monastic micro-culture have more in common than might at first be immediately obvious. They are both communities that take engagement with the New Testament text seriously; both use mimesis as central formative practices; and both participate in critical conversations. The purposes and goals of the two cultures are, however, quite different. Indeed, the difference between the goals has required modern distinction from and, ultimately, modern misunderstandings of the medieval monastic project. My study now moves from similarities and takes up the practice that most clearly defines the early medieval monastic project and sets it apart in its intention and rigor from the modern academic project and from most other communities that shape themselves around the New Testament text: the early medieval monastic liturgy.

Chapter 3

INTRODUCTION

The primary difference between modern academic culture and early medieval monastic culture is liturgy. If we understand liturgy in its broadest sense as a cycle of repeatable public rituals, then we can see that modern academic culture is not without its liturgical moments. The convocations and graduations that mark the turning points of the academic year have their origins in the Christian liturgies of the first universities and cathedral schools. Too, there is no denying a ritual quality to certain rites of passage connected with oral defenses of exams, proposals and dissertations. Academic conferences and attendant meetings have their own rites as well, but these do not have the pervasive and determinative character that marked the place of the liturgy in early medieval monastic life.

Jean Leclercq leaves a discussion of the liturgy to the final chapter of his study of monastic culture. It does not come last as an after-thought, but rather as the climax to which the rest of monastic culture builds. The last paragraph of the last full chapter of Leclercq's work pulls together the importance and place of the liturgy in monastic culture:

The liturgy is at once the mirror of a culture and its culmination. Just as the office of Corpus Christi, in the composition of which St. Thomas [Aquinas] surely participated, crowns his doctrinal work, so the hymns, sequences, and innumerable poems written by the monks are the culmination of their theology. The liturgy had been the motive for the renewal of monastic culture in the Carolingian period, and was also its fruit. During the following centuries, it is in the atmosphere of the liturgy and amid the poems composed for it, in hymnis et canticis, that the synthesis of all the artes was effected, of the literary techniques, religious reflection, and all sources of information whether biblical, patristic, or classical. In the liturgy, all these resources fully attained their final potentiality; they were restored to God in a homage which recognized that they had come from Him. Thanksgiving, eucharist, theology, confessio fidei—all these expressions, in monastic tradition, expressed only slightly differing aspects of a single reality. In the liturgy, grammar was elevated to the rank of an eschatological fact. It participated in the eternal praise that the monks, in unison with the angels, began offering to God in the abbey choir, and which will be perpetuated in heaven. In the liturgy, love of learning and desire for God find perfect reconciliation.³⁰⁰

The liturgy is the great engine of monastic culture that gives it its indelible character and is its greatest product. It is pervasive and deeply formative.

As a result, when Leclercq speaks of the speculative character of monastic theology he identifies it as: "the outgrowth of the practice of monastic life, the living of the spiritual life which is the meditation on Holy Scripture. It is a biblical experience inseparable from liturgical experience."³⁰¹ Indeed, the liturgy provided both the normative locus for the encounter with Scripture and also its interpretation: "it was the liturgy itself which formed the usual and ordinary commentary on Holy Scripture and the Fathers."³⁰² Any attempt to separate what is "biblical" or "exegetical" in the monastic experience away from what is "liturgical" is a project doomed at the outset. Scripture—whether in blocks or sentences or phrases—formed the heart and texts of the monastic liturgy.

LITURGICAL INTERPRETATION

There were three primary ways that the liturgy interpreted Scripture. The first is by discursive means. That is, a composed, non-scriptural text would make an exegetical observation or connection that would interpret an image, unpack an allegory, or praise an action as worthy of imitation. These connections are found often found in hymns, collects, and proper prefaces, but sermons and homilies as fundamentally liturgical genre also appear in this category.

³⁰⁰ Leclercg, Love of Learning, 250-1.

³⁰¹ Leclercq, Love of Learning, 213.

³⁰² Leclercq, Love of Learning, 237.

The second, selection, is a broad category that ranges from highlighting individual verses—as for use as Little Chapters at Vespers or Lauds—to identifying large portions of text as particularly suitable for certain occasions—like selecting Gospel or Epistle texts for Mass. Isolating a single verse out of a text highlights, even more so if that verse gets repeated for the whole rest of the liturgical season. For instance, certain versicle and response pairs are repeated daily throughout certain liturgical seasons. The effect is that these two verse snippets become an integral part of the monastic experience of the season. Whether brief or extended, selection makes a difference and alters, sometimes subtly, sometimes profoundly, how a monastic would encounter that same passage again whether inside or outside of the liturgy.

The third builds on the second and is far more common, pervasive, and complicated then the first: pregnant juxtapositions. Many liturgical forms like the antiphons used with the invitatory, the psalms, and the gospel canticles, the preces (prayers), responsories, little chapters and others consist of taking the material selected from Scripture and placing it in relation to other Scriptural materials. That is, the liturgy may take two passages from two entirely different parts of the canon but by placing them next to each other has created, in essence, a new Scriptural concept or narrative. No interpretation is given or even suggested, yet the liturgy presents an interpretive puzzle; there is no explicit interpretation yet the arrangement implies that they belong together. The connection between texts is loaded with potential meaning, but the liturgy leaves it in a potential state—a state pregnant with yet undelivered meaning. The under-determined character requires the reader and the whole reading community to actively participate in the process of meaning making by creating comprehensible connections. These texts and the relationship between them have a spiritual meaning; it is up to the participants to uncover what it may be. The connections showcased in the writings of medieval liturgists like Amalarius of Metz and the whole expositio missae genre sometime strike modern exegetes as quite fanciful. Nonetheless, these authors were operating from the firm conviction that no texts that appear together in the liturgy do so by mere chance; rather, the Spirit is speaking a spiritual truth that the participant must uncover.

Indeed to a large degree the success and longevity of the liturgy is due to a fundamentally underdetermined approach to meaning. By using Scriptural selections and creating pregnant juxtapositions, the liturgy creates many different opportunities for reading that are open-ended. The range of possible or potential meanings suggested can never be exhausted and, as a result, the same texts in the same configurations can continue to speak to new readers in new ways over generations.

Because of the underdetermined character of this arrangement, though, tracing direct influence of the liturgy on a given text is difficult. The best sign that liturgical suggestions lay behind interpretations is when the same texts suggested by the liturgy appear in conversation with the primary text in a homily or sermon.

THE THREE KINDS OF LITURGICAL SERVICES

In order to understand the mechanics of liturgical formation, it is necessary to sketch the outline of the monastic services, the daily ordo. I begin with an overview of the three fundamental kinds of liturgical services, where the greatest interpretive possibilities lay, then will examine how these liturgies inter-related within the specific context of England's Benedictine Revival.

Within the monastic ordo, there are three basic kinds of services that serve slightly different functions. The primary purpose of all liturgy, in the medieval mind, is the praise of God. In connection to this primary purpose are three secondary purposes specific to certain services: the Daily Office or synaxses had a catechetical role, the Masses had a sacramental role, the Chapter had an administrative role.

Two primary sources serve to delineate the bare-bones of the services, the Rule of Benedict and the Ordines Romani. While Benedict's Rule gives a snapshot of early 6th century Italian customs that become largely normative, the Ordines Romani is the name given to a broad collection of materials that traveled in general groupings compiled anonymously from the 7th through the 11th centuries that told how the various services were to be performed. Beyond these base texts, documents called "customaries" gave elucidations, elaborations, and instructions on local practice. Thankfully, two customaries survive from Anglo-Saxon England, enabling us to know quite a lot about how these services were actually performed at the time of the Benedictine Revival. The first is the Regularis Concordia (RC), written by Bishop Æthelwold, Ælfric's teacher; the second is Ælfric's own customary, the Letter to the Monks of Eynsham (LME). These will be used in combination with the other documents to sketch a sense of the main structure of the liturgies that shaped monastic days.

The Daily Office

The Daily Office is a set of fixed services of prayer whose central and identifying characteristic is the weekly recitation of the Psalter. From the earliest days in the Egyptian deserts, the Psalms had pride of place in monastic life as the truest guides of life, the most fertile source for reflection, and the most certain path to holiness. The Apothegmata Patrum records Epiphanius as saying: "The true monk should have prayer and psalmody continually in his heart." Similarly, the first two chapters of Smaragdus of Saint-Mihiel's early medieval collection of monastic wisdom, the Diadema Monachorum, are on prayer and the discipline of the psalms respectively. 305

³⁰³ The modern edition of the 50 ordines is Michel Andrieu, ed., Les Ordines romani du haut moyen âge (5 Vols. Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense 11, 23, 24, 28, 29. Louvain, 1931-1961). The single best brief treatment of the ordines—and a helpful summary of the contents of each—is Cyrille Vogel, Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources, translated and revised by William Storey and Niels Rasmussen (Portland: Pastoral, 1986), 135-224.

³⁰⁴ Ward, Sayings of the Desert Fathers, 57.

³⁰⁵ PL 102: Col. 0594C-0596A.

The monastic practice of the Daily Office as first described by Cassian has been understood as the embodiment of VgPs 118:164: "Seven times a day I praise you." By the time of Benedict, a rather literalistic reading required the introduction of another service; since one of the monastic service began in the middle of the night it could not be counted among the seven "day" services, thus Benedict legislates seven day offices and a night office (with an obligatory reference to Ps 118:62: "At midnight I arose to give you praise" 307). Confusions of counting and terminology between the older scheme recorded by Cassian and the newer scheme legislated by Benedict has plagued monastic customaries ever since.

Indeed, Ælfric's overview on clerical duties contained in his first Latin Letter to Archbishop Wulfstan speaks of seven offices:

I speak plainly to you now about the clergy because concerning them the holy fathers established that they should sing the seven synaxses, thus every day you ought to sing every [canonical] hour each day. Of these, the first synaxsis is nocturnes, the second is the 'Prime' [first] hour of the day, the third is the same hour itself which we call "Terce', the fourth is truly the Sext [sixth] hour, the fifth is the None [ninth] hour, the sixth however is the hour of Vespers, the seventh synaxsis we call Compline. 308

Here Ælfric—quoting directly from the Excerpts of Ps.-Ecgbert 28.2—follows a convention that can still be found today. The term "Night Office" can be ambiguous; since there is only a formal break between the Night Office and Lauds, the term can be extended to both. As the practice of aggregation (saying several liturgical hours at one sitting) expanded among secular clergy, Prime could also be included within the "Night Office". To avoid ambiguity, ³⁰⁶ Septies in die laudem dixi tibi. See citations of this passage in Cassian Inst. 3.4.3, 63. and RB 16:1-3.

³⁰⁷ Media nocte surgebam ad confitendum tibi.

³⁰⁸ Dico uobis nunc apertius clericis, quia hii sancti patres septem synaxes canendas constituerunt, quas omni die singulis horis canere debetis. Quarum prima est nocturnalis sinaxis, secunda prima hora diei, tertia ipsa hora est quam terciam uocamus, quarta uero sexta hora est, quinta nona hora est, sexta autem sinaxis uespera hora est, septimam namque sinaxim completorium uocitamus. Bernhard Fehr, Die Hirtenbriefe. In altenglischer und lateinischer Fassung (Reprint; Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1966 [1914]), 43.

within this work the term "Night Office" refers only to the first and longest liturgical office of the night.

As there is no universally accepted terminology used by the medieval sources, modern scholars prefer to enumerate the seven-plus-one services of the Daily Office as: the Night Office, Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and Compline. Within these eight services, three groups emerge based on structure: The Night Office, the Greater Offices—Lauds and Vespers, and the Lesser Offices—Prime, Terce, Sext, None, and Compline.

The Night Office

The Night Office is by far the longest and most complicated of the services or "hours" of the Daily Office. It is also where the reading of a sizable selection of Scripture and the reading of patristic authors occurs. Charting the Night Office is complicated because it has several forms based on the time of year, whether the day is festal or ferial, and local traditions. Since all of the homilies we shall be examining are appointed for feast days, I shall, for the sake of convenience, display a festal monastic scheme only:

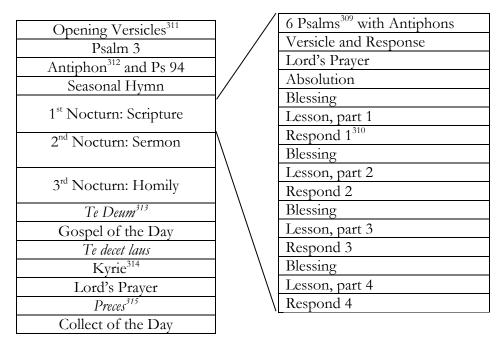

Table 1: Monastic Festal Night Office

Thus the content of the lessons vary according to the nocturn. The first is always from Scripture. The second and third nocturns only appear on a day when a liturgical occasion of import—either a feast day or a Sunday—is being celebrated. The lesson for the second nocturn is a sermo which relates information about the occasion itself. It could be a life or passion if a saint is being commemorated or simply a sermon about the season in the case of Sundays. The lesson for the third nocturn is an omelia, a homily or a section of a commentary that treats the Gospel appointed for the day. By the time of Ælfric, these readings were generally taken from a homiliary like that of Paul the Deacon.

³⁰⁹ Within the third nocturn the psalms are replaced by canticles—Scriptural hymns not found in the psalms.

³¹⁴ This is a repetition of Lord have mercy/Christ have mercy/Lord have mercy.

³¹⁰ This is a sung response that generally accords with the theme of the occasion or season—sometimes even the book of the Bible with which it is paired.

³¹¹ Chart adapted from John Harper, The Forms and Orders of Western Liturgy from the Tenth to the Eighteenth Century: A Historical Introduction and Guide for Students and Musicians (Oxford: Clarendon, 1991), 76, 93-5.

³¹² An antiphon is a short text that can be anywhere from a phrase to a couple of sentences that are said before and after a psalm or canticle—and sometimes interspersed within it as well.

³¹³ This is a creedal hymn from the 5th century.

³¹⁵ These are a set of paired sentences that fall into a verse/response pattern typically taken from Scripture.

The Greater Offices

Occurring around the times of sunrise and sunset, Lauds and Vespers ground the hinges of the day and share the same basic structure:³¹⁶

Opening Versicles ³¹⁷
Psalms with Antiphons Sentence from Scripture
Respond Seasonal Hymn
Versicle and Response
Gospel Canticle with Antiphon
Collect of the Day
Concluding Blessing

Table 2: Monastic Festal Lauds and Vespers

Four psalms are sung at Vespers and, liturgically speaking, six are sung at Lauds, but this includes an uncounted OT canticle inserted after the fifth and the sixth "psalm" is actually three psalms (Pss. 148-150). The Gospel Canticle was invariably the Benedictus (Luke 1:68–79) at Lauds and the Magnificat (Luke 1:46–55) at Vespers. The Gospel Canticle was invariably the Benedictus (Luke 1:68–79) at Lauds and the Magnificat (Luke 1:46–55) at Vespers.

The Lesser Offices

Among the Lesser Offices the three mid-day hours (Terce, Sext, and None) have an identical structure; the early and late offices of Prime and Compline are similar both to each other and to the middle hours but display differences based on their function and contain seasonal variations. As none of these difference impact the liturgy's interpretation of Scripture, I display here the pattern of the middle offices as an indication of the contents of these offices:

³¹⁶ On ferial days the Kyrie/Lord's Prayer/Preces would follow the Gospel Canticle. Our focus, however, remains on festal occasions.

³¹⁷ Chart adapted from Harper, Forms and Orders, 76-77, 97-98.

³¹⁸ These three begin in Latin with laudate and thereby give the office its name.

³¹⁹ The third great Lukan canticle, the Nunc Dimittis (Luke 2:29–32), does not appear in the Monastic Office but is used at Compline within the Secular Office.

Opening Versicles ³²⁰
Invariable Hymn
Psalms with Antiphons
Sentence from Scripture
Versicle and Response
Collect of the Day
Concluding Blessing

Table 3: Monastic Little Offices

The offices of Prime and Compline include rites of confession and absolution as well that promote their functions as offices that prepare the community for the day's work or for the night's rest.

The Mass

While Benedict's rule makes passing reference to Mass as a once-weekly affair³²¹—and speaks of admitting priests to the monastery only with reluctance³²²—by the time of the Benedictine Revival ordained monks were quite common and Masses were celebrated twice daily. The first mass which occurred on Sundays and feast days after Prime³²³ was the matitudinal mass or the morrow mass which was used for votive masses which celebrated different events or salvific persons or addressed a need facing the community or nation.³²⁴ The second mass that occurred after Terce³²⁵ was the Mass of the Day where the propers appointed for the day's liturgical observance were used.

A typical sung mass outside of a penitential season would have the following elements (elements in small capitals are sung by the choir):

³²⁰ Chart adapted from Harper, Forms and Orders, 77.

³²¹ RB 38.2.

³²² RB 60.

³²³ The Morrow Mass was placed after Terce on ferial days.

³²⁴ Ælfric directs that on Sundays the morrow mass is of the Holy Trinity unless another feast is in occurrence with the Mass of the Day in LME 10 (Jones, LME, 114-115). This is in agreement with the Regularis Concordia (See RC 1.23). The Missal of Robert of Jumièges—as a typical early medieval missal—includes some fifty-three votive masses for a host of occasions and honorees. such as two for the Blessed Virgin Mary, one in time of war, one against the pagans, one against carnal temptations, one for the royal family and so on.

³²⁵ On ferial days the Mass of the Day followed the Litany after Sext (RC 1.25).

Ordinary (Unchanging) ³²⁶	Proper (Variable based on the day & season)
	INTROIT ³²⁷
KYRIE ELEISON ³²⁸
GLORIA IN EXCELSIS
	Collect(s)
	Epistle/Reading ³²⁹ Gradual Alleluia SEQUENCE Gospel
Creed
	Offertory Secret
Beginning of Canon of the Mass Proper Preface
SANCTUS WITH BENEDICTUS
Conclusion of the Canon of the Mass
Lord's Prayer
Peace
Agnus Dei
	COMMUNIO
	Postcommunion Prayer
	Benediction ³³⁰
Dismissal

Table 4: Static and Variable Elements of the Mass

Note that a "Sermon" does not appear in this list of elements. Evidence concerning the place of sermons with masses is complicated. On one hand, it seems certain based on contemporary legislation and internal evidence within the Catholic Homilies that sermons were ³²⁷ Note that these names are not always what is found in contemporary sources. For instance, when looking at the Leofric Missal—the only surviving Anglo-Saxon Sacramentary to include the incipits of the choir texts—the following abbreviations are used to identify the corresponding liturgical elements: Introit—A. (antiphon for the following verse) and PS. (as introit texts were typically psalm verses); Gradual/Alleluia—R. (first half of the gradual), V. (second half of the gradual), AL. (the alleluia verse); Offertory—OF.; Communio—COM.; Reading—EP. (as it was frequently taken from an epistle); Gospel—EV.

³²⁶ Chart adapted from Harper, Forms and Orders, 115.

³²⁸ Evidence from surviving manuscripts indicates that tropes and proses—proper additions into the sung ordinaries (i.e., the Kyrie, Gloria, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei) and further additions to the sung propers—were introduced into England with the Benedictine Revival. However, these were highly variable and probably were used at cathedral and larger monastic establishments.

³²⁹ Epistle is the usual term for this biblical reading but is technically incorrect; readings on fasting and penitential days came from the Old Testament.

³³⁰ The Benediction was the prerogative of the bishop. Generally there were separate books for bishops called benedictionals where these prayers were located but occasionally they were integrated into the text of sacramentaries as in the Leofric Missal.

delivered within the Mass of the Day. Both the Excerpts of Ps.-Ecgbert and the Rule of Chrodegang mandate preaching by the clergy to the people: the first requires it weekly, the second fortnightly—but expresses a clear preference for preaching on all Sundays and feast days. 331 Too, Ælfric's sermons often incorporate material from the Epistle, suggesting that he had specifically reworked the sermons for that series for the mass. 332 On the other hand, none of the liturgical documents from the period mention a sermon in the mass; none of the ordines identify when it would have fallen. Certainly a sermon would not have appeared within the Morrow Mass; the evidence in support of preaching implies that it would have occurred in Masses of the Day on Sundays and major feast days, most likely after the Gospel.

The Chapter

Chapter was the daily monastic business meeting. Discussions of community business, admission of faults, and preparations for upcoming events—liturgical and otherwise—were all part of this meeting. Symptomatic of the pervasive quality of liturgy in the monasteries, this business meeting also had a fundamentally liturgical structure. The RC contains a thorough description of how Chapter was to occur within Benedictine Revival monastic houses:333

Salute of the Cross
Martyrology
Versicles and Response Collect
Reading and Explanation of the Gospel of the Day ³³⁴
Confession of Faults
5 Psalms for the Departed Brethren

Table 5: The Monastic Chapter

³³¹ Chrodegang. Rule of Chrodegang. ch. 44. (PL 89:1079C-D).

³³² A greater discussion of this tendencies appears below in ch 4.

³³³ RC 1.21. (Symons, RC, 17).

³³⁴ On ferial days a section of Benedict's Rule was read.

The martyrology was the reading of the life or passion of the saint or saints who would be celebrated on the following liturgical day. The RC does not go into detail concerning the required "exposition of the Gospel" but given the monastic preference for maintaining traditional expositions, it would seem likely that this would be another opportunity for the use of a prepared homily rather than a truly extemporaneous discussion from the abbot. Indeed, Symons notes that other monastic customaries from the period explicitly the reading of an "omelia" at this point. 335

THE MONASTIC DAY-CYCLE

By the time of the Benedictine Revival, these liturgies had been supplemented with additional offices that both preceded and followed the regular hours and occasions, to the degree that monks spent over half of their waking hours in liturgies of one sort or another. A monastic feast day was longer than other days in the calendar. Rather than being reckoned from midnight to midnight, a feast began at Vespers on the evening before the feast, then ran through Compline on the feast itself. In later medieval parlance these were referred to as "doubles" in part because the day had two Vespers offices that were therefore distinguished as the First and Second Vespers. Thus, monastic Sundays and feast days in the summer according to the RC would look something like this:

6:00 PM ³³⁶	First Vespers
	Psalms, etc. for the royal house
	Anthems of Cross, BVM, patron saints
	Vespers & Matins of All Saints
	Vespers, Vigils, Lauds for the Dead
7:30 PM	Change into night shoes
	Collatio (drink and reading from Conferences or Vita Patrum)
8:00 PM	Compline
	Trina Oratio (Set of psalms and collects for the royal house)
8:15 PM	Retire
3:30 AM	Night Office

³³⁵ Symons, RC, 17 n.b.

³³⁶ Adapted from the chart in David Knowles, The Monastic Order in England (Oxford: Clarendon, 1968), 714-5.

	Lauds
	Miserere
	Psalms, etc. for the royal house
	Anthems of Cross, BVM, patron saints
	Matins of All Saints
	Change shoes/wash
5:00 AM	Trina Oratio
	Reading
6:00 AM	Prime
	Psalms and Prayers
	Morrow Mass
	Chapter
	Five psalms for the dead
7:30 AM	Work
8:00 AM	Terce
	Mass of the Day
9:30 AM	Reading
11:30 AM	Sext
	Psalms, etc. for royal house
12:00 PM	Dinner
1:00 PM	Siesta
2:30 PM	None
	Psalms etc., for royal house
	Drink
3:00 PM	Work
5:30 PM	Supper
6:00 PM	Second Vespers
	Psalms, etc. for the royal house
	Anthems of Cross, BVM, patron saints
	Vespers & Matins of All Saints
	Vespers, Vigils, Lauds for the Dead
7:30 PM	Change into night shoes
	Collatio (drink and reading from Conferences or Vita Patrum)
8:00 PM	Compline
	Trina Oratio (Set of psalms and collects for the royal house)
8:15 PM	Retire

Table 6: The Monastic Day according to the Regularis Concordia

Just as the three types of liturgical services interwove between one another, so the Scriptural materials and cycles that defined each one were shared to form a whole that created the theological and liturgical shape of life within the monastic enclosure.

SCRIPTURE AND THE CHURCH YEAR

Keeping time in the early medieval church was a complicated affair. Harper in his standard introductory handbook on the medieval liturgy notes that:

The daily liturgy is regulated by four overlapping and interacting cycles:

the daily cycle of Office and Mass;

the weekly cycle;

the annual cycle of liturgical seasons (Temporale);

the annual cycle of feast days (Sanctorale).337

Within these cycles of keeping time, there were several operative lectionaries. Each of these four different cycles required their own sets of readings, totaling no less than eight distinct lectionaries. These were:

- 1. A Psalms lectionary that ordered all 150 psalms within the 8 daily liturgical Offices, repeating every week;
- 2. A program of continual reading (lectio continua) that read through the Old and New Testaments excluding the Gospels once every year at the Night Office, sometimes spilling over into mealtimes;
- 3. A Gospel Mass/Night Office/Chapter lectionary for the Temporale;³³⁸
- 4. The Mass Propers for the Temporale taken primarily but not exclusively from the Psalms;
- 5. A Readings (Lectiones) Mass lectionary for the Temporale;
- 6. A Gospel Mass/Night Office/Chapter lectionary for the Sanctorale;
- 7. The Mass Propers for the Sanctoral taken primarily but not exclusively from the Psalms;
- 8. A Readings (Lectiones) Mass lectionary for the Sanctorale;

Lectionaries 3 through 5 and 6 through 8 were roughly correlated with one another although they were typically kept within separate liturgical books.³³⁹ The Gospel readings that fell on ³³⁷ Harper, Forms and Orders, 45.

³³⁸ The same Gospel reading was used at the Mass of the Day, Chapter, and the third nocturn of the Night Office

³³⁹ Our physical evidence for Gospel and Reading lectionaries from Anglo-Saxon England is scant: only six gospel-lectionaries survive (Helmut Gneuss, "Liturgical books in Anglo-Saxon England and their Old English

Sundays and feast-days were repeated three times; first at Chapter, then at the principal Mass of the Day along with the other readings, but also at the end of the Night Office. With the standardization of the Mass liturgy and its lectionaries in the Carolingian period, yet another cycle of non-Scriptural readings evolved as homiliaries, like that of Paul the Deacon, that identified pertinent pericopes from patristic sources to be read as sermons on the occasion and homilies on the appointed Gospel to be read in the second and third nocturns of the Night Office respectively.³⁴⁰

The early medieval Church Year was composed of two yearly cycles of seasons and daily observances—both feasts and fasts—superimposed upon one another.341 The first, the temporal cycle or Temporale, was a yearly remembrance of the birth, life, death, acts, and teachings of Christ. The second, the sanctoral cycle or Sanctorale, was theologically a continuation of the Temporale that celebrated the people whose lives, deaths, and intercession after their earthly lives demonstrated the power of Christ working through them, maintaining Christ's presence in the world through the Church by the power of the Spirit. Structurally and theologically, the Temporale was the more important of the two; functionally, though, the second increased at a rapid rate as saints worthy of veneration continued to be produced by the Church through the ages.³⁴²

Within the life of the early medieval monastic establishment, a change of liturgical seasons signaled a change in life—liturgical and otherwise. The beginning of a season marked a change in the biblical texts that a community read, a change in the musical settings terminology," pages 91-141 in Learning and literature in Anglo-Saxon England: studies presented to Peter Clemoes on the occasion of his sixty-fifth birthday, edited by Michael Lapidge and Helmut Gneuss (Cambridge; New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985), 109) and no epistolaries (Gneuss, "Liturgical Books," 111-10). Both Gneuss and Lenker concur that there were also mixed lectionaries containing both Gospels and Readings but none survive beyond possible fragments (Gneuss, "Liturgical Books," 105-6, 110; Lenker, "WSG," 158-9). ³⁴⁰ For more on homiliaries see the discussion of the Critical Conversation in Chapter 2.

³⁴¹ The early medieval Church Year was very similar to the Church Year celebrated in modern liturgical western churches (like the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and some Lutheran churches) but the two are not identical. ³⁴² The two main liturgical reforms of the Roman Catholic Church, the Council of Trent and Vatican II, both pruned back a Sanctorale that had, by the sheer number of observances, threatened to eclipse the Temporale. Indeed, many of the Protestant reformers in the sixteenth century asserted the primacy of the Temporale through their resistance to the cult of saints although—certainly—other factors were at work there as well.

and the textual contents of the life of prayer, possibly changes in the colors of vestments in the oratory, even changes in what the monastics ate and wore. The changes of seasons affected life throughout the monastery; as a result, they affected thinking within the monastery. The seasons were comprehensive periods of formation, mimetic modeling of an aspect of Israel, her Christ, or his Church that engaged the mind with doctrines, the heart with religious affections, and the body with acts of penance, ascesis, or holy joy. Reading the gospels within these contexts foregrounded either primary or latent meanings in the text that accorded with these doctrines, affections, and acts. Thus, reading sermons as monastic exeges must consider the season as a primary interpretive influence.

The seasons, however, are also not as straight-forward as they appear. In discussing the various periods of liturgical time, monastic authors tended to focus upon celebrations as days and fasts as seasons. Thus, authors like Ælfric, Isidore, Hrabanus Maurus, Amalarius, and even the anonymous author of the OE Menologium and Seasons for Fasting gave catalogs of feasts, but discrete periods of time for fasts. These complicate a facile or even an early twenty-first century ecclesiastical notion of the relationship between season and shorter periods of time like octaves and days. The paucity of customaries and comprehensive ordinals prevents sweeping generalizations about a host of issues like the definitive beginnings and endings of all seasons or aspects of seasonal celebrations within any given monastic community. Particular problematic issues include the status of the season after Epiphany, the use of liturgical color in the early medieval period or the beginning of the Advent season—which differing traditions located around either the Feast of St Andrew (Nov 30) or St Martin (Nov 11). As a result, it is more useful to utilize the word "season" in its most ambiguous sense as a general period of time rather than its most strict sense of a rigidly proscribed unit of time. 343

2.4

³⁴³ Our ambiguity need not be theirs, though. Just because we do not know when a given season stopped and started at a given time and place does not mean that they did not know.

The hermeneutics of any given season were constructed dialogically in relation to the biblical passages read during the season. That is, any given Gospel pericope read within a season, was acted upon and interpreted by all of the other Scripture which gave the season its character. Furthermore, that pericope itself was both interpreted through the seasonal hermeneutic and contributed to it, adding its distinctive elements and images to the seasonal gestalt. Understanding and reconstructing a seasonal hermeneutic, then, means exploring at least four elements:

- 1. How do the primary feasts of the season establish the mimetic and doctrinal emphases around which everything else is oriented?
- 2. How do the lectionaries of both Mass and Office orient themselves around these emphases and add Scriptural images, affections, and notions to the character of the season?
- 3. How do the liturgical changes of text, tune, and liturgical action of the season and its secondary feasts concentrate the religious affections established by the first two?
- 4. Finally, how do the seasonal life changes in diet and activity cement the mimetic and affectional character of the season into a holistic process of spiritual and moral formation?

Consideration of these factors in creative tension with seasonally-shaped exegesis and proclamation will lead to a much better understanding of the interpretive forces acting upon any particular text read within a season. A preliminary example appropriate to the scope of this study is the season of Christmas;³⁴⁴ I sketch the rudiments of the season's hermeneutic using the fourfold schema above.

The season of Christmas spans a spare thirteen days,³⁴⁵ the period of time from the Vigil of Christmas (Dec 24) through Epiphany (Jan 6). Within this time span, thirteen ³⁴⁴ Indeed, an entire dissertation could focus upon identifying the various factors that make up the interpretive character of a single lengthy season like Lent or Easter. In this work I do not have the luxury of exploring one of these major seasons in length but can only offer suggestions through a brief examination of the shortest of the seasons.

-

³⁴⁵ This thirteen includes the traditional 12 days from Christmas to Epiphany plus the Vigil of Christmas.

different liturgical occasions have their own proper texts and readings.³⁴⁶ The primary feast days of the Christmas season are two: Christmas and Epiphany. These two serve as hinge festivals, defining the formal beginning and ending of the season³⁴⁷ as well as its primary emphases.

The Feast of Christmas celebrates the birth of Christ and the subsequent rejoicing of celestial beings, Israel, and the Church. Doctrinally, the feast establishes and celebrates the Incarnation of Christ, noting both Jesus' assumption of humanity through his birth from the Virgin Mary and his pre-existent divinity that rested—co-eternal—in the bosom of the Father.

Epiphany celebrates the manifestation of Christ to Israel and beyond through a conflation of Scriptural events, most notably the gifts of the Magi, the baptism of Christ by John, and the first miracle of Jesus in the wedding at Cana. The main doctrine and image of the feast combine in a single scriptural phrase, Christ as "the light for revelation to the Gentiles," that lent its force to the characterization of the entire Christmas season. The season places both Israel and the Church before the eyes of the community as a pattern for imitation. The emphasis in Christmas and Epiphany sermons is on witnessing the miracle of the Incarnation with the shepherds and the angels and on recognizing Christ in his manifestations with the Magi, John the Baptist, and the first disciples.

The Gospel lectionaries for the season of Christmas draw their texts from the beginning of the gospels of Matthew, Luke, and John; the exceptions are the feasts of St Stephen, St Silvester and St John which draw their readings from the ends of Matthew and ³⁴⁶ They are: 1) the Vigil of Christmas, 2-4) three Masses for Christmas, 5) the Feast of St Stephen, 6) the Feast of St John the Evangelist, 7) the Feast of the Holy Innocents, 8) the Feast of St Silvester, 9) the Octave of Christmas/Holy Name, 10) the First Sunday after Christmas, 11) the Second Sunday after Christmas, 12) the Vigil of Epiphany, and 13) Epiphany.

³⁴⁷ While a case could be made that the influence of the Christmas season stretches through the Octave of Epiphany, the time after Epiphany has its own distinct character. ³⁴⁸ Luke 2:32.

John respectively. In all, readings for the season encompass Matt 1:18-21;³⁴⁹ 2:1-23;³⁵⁰ Luke 2:1-40;³⁵¹ and John 1:1-14.³⁵² The readings of the Night Offices are dominated by Isaiah, particularly the familiar messianic texts and passages of celebration. Thus both the RC and the LME appoint Isa 9:1ff, Isa 40:1ff, and Isa 52:1ff for the Christmas readings.

Liturgically speaking, the Christmas season blossoms. The Gloria which had been removed from Mass for the Advent fast is restored. Across both Mass and Office, the ordinary texts are musically ornamented with more complex and beautiful arrangements including the addition of tropes. The proper texts utilize both the theology and the images of the biblical texts.

One example, a representative liturgical book, serves as a suitable demonstration of how these seasonal principles are applied to the liturgy of the Mass. The Leofric Missal (Oxford, Bodleian Library MS. Bodl. 579)³⁵³ is a well-preserved missal in use during the Benedictine Revival. Containing three layers of texts, the most recent editors³⁵⁴ have hypothesized that the manuscript at the core of the book was used by St Dunstan of Canterbury (†988), one of the three great monastic bishops of the Revival. Its texts represent a standard liturgical book of the '8th Century Mixed Gelasian' type appropriate to the period.

The Leofric Missal's kalendar³⁵⁵ is well preserved and is laid out in orderly columns, dates on left side with golden numbers and letters, names of liturgical and astronomical occurrences in the right column. The pages identify five levels of feasts by script hierarchies. Proceeding from least to most important they are: 1) solemnities with no prefix written in a black Anglo-Saxon miniscule, 2) solemnities prefixed by a red S but with the name of the ³⁴⁹ Vigil of Christmas.

³⁵⁰ Epiphany: 2:1-12; Holy Innocents: 2:13-23; Vigil of Epiphany/2nd Sunday after Christmas: 2:19-23.

³⁵¹ Christmas I: 2:1-14; Christmas II: 2:15-20; Octave of Christmas: 2:21-32; 1st Sunday after Christmas: 2:33-40.

³⁵² Christmas III.

³⁵³ The Leofric Missal is online in its entirety: http://image.ox.ac.uk/show?collection=bodleian&manuscript=msbodl579 occasion written in black Anglo-Saxon miniscule, 3) solemnities prefixed with a red F with the name written in black rustic capitals, 4) solemnities written in red rustic capitals, and 5) solemnities prefixed by an F and written in multicolored rustic capitals. Of the Christmas observances, the Feast of Christmas itself and the next three days—St Stephen, St John, and Holy Innocents are grade 5, the Vigil of Christmas is grade 4, the Circumcision and Epiphany are grade 3, and the Octave of Epiphany and St Silvester are grade 2. The Sunday occasions are not present as they are moveable rather than static feasts.³⁵⁶

³⁵⁴ Nicholas Orchard, ed., The Leofric Missal, 2 vols. (Henry Bradshaw Society 113 & 114; Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell, 2002).

³⁵⁵ Fols. 39r-44v.

Of the eighty-one liturgical items represented throughout the Christmas season in this book, several themes reappear. While word-frequency counts are a crude method of determining themes and emphases, they do establish the presence of ideas and themes without the distractions of an in-depth analysis. Certain doctrinal and conceptual terms occur frequently. The doctrine of the Incarnation is mentioned through references to commingling of humanity and divinity or incarnation itself 21 times. Terms for birth is also central and appear 17 times. Terms for light appear seventeen times as well. In addition to doctrinal language, affectional language also adds to the character of the season. The root gaud- used to form the nominal, verbal, and adjectival forms of the word "rejoice" appears 12 times.

Out of these prayers, a few deserve special attention for the way they illustrate the interplay between liturgical texts, seasons, and the exegetical project. Some, like the Preface for the Octave of Christmas are broadly synthetic, drawing together a number of images, doctrines and themes to illuminate the season:

³⁵⁶ By way of comparison the highest graded feast in December or January not part of the Christmas season is the Feast of St Thomas (Dec 21) which is grade 3. Even other occasions celebrating biblical feasts do not rank as high; the Conversion of St Paul (Jan 25) is only a grade 2.

³⁵⁷ Items 348, 349, 354, 359, 361, 365, 366, 369, 372, 375, 377, 378, 380, 384, 386, 389, 403, 404, 410, 1315, and 1316. For ease of reference and for purposes of comparison, modern editors of liturgical texts number all prayers, rubrics, and notices. The numbers given here represent the discrete items—prayers, in this case—within the Leofric Missal.

³⁵⁸ Items 348, 349, 350, 354, 356, 361, 365, 366, 368, 371, 379, 385, 387, 389, 399, 1305, and 1307.

³⁵⁹ Items 349, 352, 359, 363, 369, 373, 376, 397, 399, 401, 403, 405, 407, 408, 409, 1313, and 1325.

³⁶⁰ Items 347, 349, 352, 356, 371, 380, 384, 385, 390, 407, 1327, and 1328.

...Through Christ our Lord to whom, celebrating today the day of his circumcision and the octave of his birth, we venerate your wonders, Lord: she who gave birth is both mother and virgin, he who was born is both baby and God. Deservedly, the heavens spoke, the angels gave thanks, the shepherds rejoiced, the magi changed, kings were disturbed, the little ones through their passion were crowned with glory. And therefore with angels...³⁶¹

This preface begins by identifying the specific observance it celebrates, both the liturgical octave and a biblical event, the circumcision of Jesus (Luke 2:21). Then, it succinctly summarizes the twin paradoxes of Christmas: the Incarnation and the perpetual virginity of the BVM. It places in service of these two events a host of biblical events by way of allusion, touching not only the gospel accounts³⁶² but also typological cross-references.³⁶³ Liturgical event, theological doctrine, and the biblical text are joined in liturgical prayer.

Other prayers directly present a variety of exegetical interpretations of the appointed texts. For instance, the collect for the Feast of St Stephen highlights one particular aspect of the Acts account:

Grant us, Lord, we beseech you, to imitate him whom we honor, that we might also learn to love our enemies, for we celebrate the [heavenly] nativity of him who yet knew to intercede passione coronati. Et ideo cum angelis... Orchard, Leofric, 111. The "VD" beginning this and all other proper prefaces is an abbreviation for the first two words and thus the whole of the transitional phrase leading into the proper preface: "Vere dignum...".

³⁶¹ Item 389: VD per christum dominum nostrum. Cuius hodie circumcisionis diem et nativitatis octauum celebrantes, tua domine mirabilia ueneramur. Quia quae peperit et mater et virgo est, qui natus est et infans et deus est.. Merito caeli locuti sunt, angeli gratulati, pastores laetati, magi mutati, reges turbati, paruuli gloriosa

³⁶² Thus, angeli gratulati alludes to Luke 2:13ff; pastores laetati alludes to Luke 2:18, 20; magi mutati refers to Matt 2:12 but possibly also to apocryphal accounts of the conversion of the Magi; paruuli gloriosa passione coronati alludes to Matt 2:16-18.

³⁶³ The phrase caeli locuti sunt can be understood as a metonymy referring to the angels; however, a direct citation of angels as the next item of the list would render it repetitive. More likely this phrase is a reference to Ps 18:1 especially given the Incarnational interpretation given to Ps 18:1-6 in the early and medieval Church (See the Christmas hymn "Veni redemptor gentium"). Similarly, reges turbati appears to refer directly to Matt 2:3 and it does: "Audiens autem Herodes rex turbatus est et omnis Hierosolyma cum illo." The use of the plural reges where Matt uses the singular rex accomplishes two purposes. First, it preserves the parallelism and the use of the distributive plural helping verb sunt. Second, it links the passage with Ps 2:1, a psalm whose messianic implications were patently clear to the church and who understood the use of the plural in the psalm to be a syllepsis following Acts 4:25ff.

on behalf of his enemies to our Lord Jesus Christ, who lives and reigns with you and the Holy Spirit.³⁶⁴

Stephen is presented as an example for moral imitation and emulation. Out of the Stephen narrative, the collect identifies Acts 7:60—Stephen's prayer of forgiveness for his killers—as the central point of the reading. Correctly following Luke's intention back to Luke 23:34, the collect identifies Stephen as a type of Christ, emulating his death. This, in turn, is connected to Christ's command in Matt 5:44 to love enemies and to pray for those who persecute.³⁶⁵

Two of the propers for the Feast of the Holy Innocents utilize a shared figure to establish a meaning for the feast. The collect reads:

God, whose praise today the innocent martyrs, not in speaking but in dying, confessed; mortify all evils of vices in us, that as our tongues might speak of your faith our lives also might declare [it] with habits; through Jesus Christ our Lord.³⁶⁶

The second prayer of the benediction is:

And he who granted to them, who confessed his only Son our Lord not in speaking but in dying, grant to you (pl) that as your tongue might declare the true faith, also upright habits, that a blameless life might declare it. Amen.³⁶⁷

Utilizing rhetorical paradoxes, the prayers exhort the congregation to emulate tropologically the infant martyrs by an appeal to honor. Just as those who cannot speak witnessed to Christ, ³⁶⁵ The collect bears the Matthean version of this teaching in mind rather than its parallel in Luke 6:35 for the Lukan version does not mention praying for persecutors.

³⁶⁴ Item 1305: Da nobis Domine quesumus imitari quod colimus, ut discamus et inimicos diligere, quia eius natalitia celebramus, qui nouit etiam pro persecutoribus exorare, dominum nostrum ihesum christum. Qui tecum. Orchard, Leofric, 239.

³⁶⁶ Item 1323: Deus cuius hodierna die preconium innocentes martyres non loquendo sed moriendo confessi sunt, omnia in nobis uitiorum mala mortifica, ut fidem tuam quam lingua nostra loquitur, etiam moribus uita fateatur. Orchard, Leofrie, 242.

³⁶⁷ Item 1327b: Et qui concessit, unicum filium eius dominum nostrum non loquendo sed moriendo confiterentur, concedat uobis ut fidem ueram quam lingua uestra fatetur, etiam mores probi, et uita inculpabilis fateatur. Amen. Orchard, Leofric, 243.

so we too should bear witness to Christ without speech through the silent witness of virtuous living.

Furthermore, the triple benediction for the Octave of Christmas packs a substantial amount of exegesis into a few lines:

May Almighty God, whose only begotten Son on today's day did not undermine the Law but come to satisfy it in the flesh received circumcision, purify your minds with the spiritual circumcision from all incentives to vices, and pour his benediction upon us. Amen.

And he who gave the Law through Moses, that he might give the blessing of our mediators, may he draw from us the mortification of vices and make us persevere in new virtue. Amen.

That thus in the number six you might live in perfection in this age, and in seven you might rest among the host of blessed spirits, in order that in the number eight, renewed by the resurrection, enriched with the remission of the jubilee, you may attain to the joys that will remain without end.³⁶⁸

The first blessing utilizes the spiritualization of circumcision found in the prophets³⁶⁹ and in the NT³⁷⁰ to make a tropological point about vice and virtue in the contemporary congregation. Both the first and the second draw attention to the value of the Law although they do not suggest that the Law be followed literally; again, a tropological interpretation dominates. The third blessing utilizes numerological interpretation to interpret the eighth day, connecting the circumcision with resurrection according to the standard interpretation of numbers popularized by Augustine and others.

³⁶⁸ Item 390: Omnipotens deus, cuius unigenitus hodierna die ne legem solueret quam adimplere uenerat corporalem suscepit circumcisionem, spiritali circumcisione mentes uestras ab omnibus uiciorum incentiuis expurget, et suam in uos infundat benedictionem. Amen.

Et qui legem per moysen dedit ut per mediatorum nostrum benedictionem daret, exuat uos mortificatione uiciorum, et faciat perseuerare in nouitate uirtutum. Amen.

Quo sic in senarii numeri perfectione in hoc seculo uiuatis. et in septenario inter beatorum spirituum agmina requiescatis, quatinus in octauo resurrectione renouatum iubelei remissione ditati, ad gaudia sine fine mansura perueniatis. Amen. Orchard, Leofric, 111-112. In the above translation, I have amended the text to "renouati" on the advice of Dr. Carin Ruff.

³⁶⁹ Jer 4:4; 9:26.

³⁷⁰ Col 2:11; Gal 6:15.

Secondary Occasions of the Season

The secondary feasts of the Christmas season that add texture and nuance are the Feast of the Holy Name/Circumcision (Jan 1) and three irregular feasts. Irregular fits these occasions because Christmas is one of the few seasons where Sanctorale occasions are coopted into the Temporale.³⁷¹ The three days immediately following Christmas Day are celebrated as the Feasts of St Stephen (Dec 26), St John (Dec 27), and the Holy Innocents (Dec 28). While the Feast of the Holy Name continues to emphasize the particularity of the Incarnation—that Jesus was born to a specifically Jewish household where he was circumcised on the eighth day as a matter of course—the other three add a different cast to an otherwise joyful season.

The first and third feasts provide a dark undertone because they focus upon two occasions of death. St Stephen is the Protomartyr, the first Christian to die for his faith. The liturgical emphasis of the feast is on St Stephen's exemplary love for his enemies, following in Christ's own footsteps, as manifested in the collect for the day.

The feast of the Holy Innocents, those children slaughtered in the search for Jesus recorded in Matt 2:16-18, both maintain the canonical contents of the birth narrative but also juxtapose images of infants—a key Christmas image—with death. The Gospel reading, Matt 2:13-23, is treated both tropologically and typologically in the propers. In addition to the collect and benediction addressed above ³⁷² the preface emphasizes the tropological significance of these children-saints and further identifies them as types of Christ:

...Eternal God. Even the precious deaths of little ones, who the cruel rage of the bestial Herod killed on account of the infant of our salvation, proclaim your immense mercy In which only more grace shines as volition and confession is manifest prior to speech. Before

_

³⁷¹ While the Feast of St Silvester is celebrated on Dec 29, the celebration of this prelate has not been integrated into the Christmas season in the same fashion as the biblical saints. The prayers of the Mass set are those of a confessor pope.

³⁷² See p. 2.

the passion, as worthy members of the passion, they were witnesses of Christ whom they did not yet know. O infinite goodness, O ineffable mercy to those slaughtered on account of your name, the merit of glory will not be allowed to die. But, to their own blood poured out was also added the salvation of regeneration and the crown of martyrdom bestowed. And behold with angels...³⁷³

The death of the infants foreshadows the death of God's Son—the Christmas infant. Just as the shedding of their blood produced regeneration and the crown of glory, so too will his. These sanctoral occasions, then, add to the sense of the season by reminding the community that the Incarnation is completed in the Cross; Bethlehem is preparation for Calvary. Although the occasion of a joyful birth, Christmas is the birth of the perfect sacrificial victim.

The second feast, St John, returns to the main theme of the season and reinforces the divinity of Christ. The propers for the festival emphasize both the hidden (archana) language of John and his emphasis upon the divinity of Christ.³⁷⁴ The Preface for the feast makes the explicit connection between the Feast of St John and Christmas by ending the prayer with a direct citation of John 1:1, the Gospel for the principal Mass of Christmas:

Eternal God, we venerate the birthday of your blessed apostle and evangelist John who was called to his vocation by our Lord Jesus Christ, your Son, making a disciple from a fisherman. Exceeding the human way of understanding, he contemplated with his mind and revealed with his voice prior to others the divinity of your very Word who was without beginning, for in the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God and the Word was God.³⁷⁵

_

³⁷³ Item 1325: VD aeterne deus. Et impreciosis mortibus paruulorum, quos propter nostri saluatoris infantiam bestiali seuitia herodes funestus occidit, immensa clementiae tuae dona predicare. In quibus fulget sola magis gratia quam uoluntas, et clara est prius confessio quam loquela. Ante passio, quam membra idonea passioni. Existunt testes christi, qui eius nondum fuerant agnitores. O infinita benignitas. O ineffabilis misericordia, quae pro suo nomine trucidatis, meritum gloriae perire not patitur. Sed proprio cruore perfusis, et salus regenerationis adhibetur, et imputatur corona martyrii. Et ideo cum angelis. Orchard, Leofric, 243.

³⁷⁴ The use of archana ties into other prayers for the season which use archana and mysterium to speak of the Incarnation.

³⁷⁵ Item 1315: VD aeterne deus. Beati apostoli tui et euangeliste iohannis, natalitia uenerantes. Qui domini nostri ihesu christi filii tui uocatione suscepta, factus ex piscatore discipulus. Humane modum dispensationis

The preface neatly gathers the two factors that link John and his gospel so closely to the Western Church's conception of Christmas: John's special emphasis on the divinity in the midst of Jesus' humanity and on the paradox of the Pre-existent Word taking on corruptible flesh.

Despite the shadow of the cross cast by two of these feasts, the ways of life in the Christmas season reinforce its predominately joyful character. The food restrictions of Advent³⁷⁶ are relaxed and the twelve days of the season are times of feasting. Sensual aspects of the liturgy enrich and enliven the celebration; Ælfric ordered that in his community all of the bells are to be rung during Mass, Vespers, and the Night Office. Furthermore, a thurible provides incense at the Mass and Gospel Canticles at Lauds and Vespers.³⁷⁷

The prayers of the Leofric Missal's Mass sets, then, present Christmas as a season focused on the joy and mystery of the Incarnation. Morally, it calls for a re-dedication to a life of virtue and holds up the first martyrs both as exempla and as types of Christ's own death—the ultimate purpose of the Incarnation. As John perceived the divinity within the human Jesus, the congregation is invited to likewise understand the Christmas child to be true God as well as true man.

When we turn to the Office hymns of the Christmas Season, we find the same themes. Because of their length, however, the hymns were able to interweave theology with biblical narrative in a more comprehensive fashion. Not departing from the intentions that we find in the mass sets, here the thoughts are expanded, expounded, and further connected to either theological themes and to even more Scriptural texts.

e

excedens, ipsam uerbi tui sine initio deitatis pre ceteris et mente conspiceret, et uoce proferret. Quia in principio erat uerbum, et uerbum erat apud deum, et deus erat uerbum. Per quem. Orchard, Leofric, 241. ³⁷⁶ Referred to in Irish rules as the Winter Lent.

³⁷⁷ LME 22.

In the Anglo-Saxon hymnals,³⁷⁸ the Christmas Season appears in a block typically containing 11 hymns—4 (sometimes 3) for Christmas itself, 3 for the feast of St Stephen, 4 for Epiphany. While the same hymns usually appear, going back to a common continental source brought to England with the Benedictine Revival, there is often not agreement as to which of the Offices a given hymn was to be sung—First Vespers, the Night Office, Lauds, or Second Vespers. Of particular importance for the season are the Christmas Day hymns—these would be sung throughout the Octave (if not the season) if no other feast superseded them.

As noted above, certain words and concepts inevitably appear over and over again, maintaining the focus on the doctrinal, theological, and Scriptural themes highlighted by the Christmas season. The notion of Incarnation appears some 17 times,³⁷⁹ birth appears 15 times,³⁸⁰ and light 10 times.³⁸¹ The affectional cues of gaud- (rejoice) and laud- (praise) appear 3³⁸² and 9³⁸³ times, respectively. While the counts on affectional words are rather few, the primary affectional for these selections—their music—are mostly lost to us; only a few of the tunes were transmitted in the Anglo-Saxon hymnals.

The hymn Christe, Redemptor Omnium contains a classic example of the kind of exegetical play that link different liturgies through common Scriptural threads. The third verse addresses the universal praise of the cosmos at the birth of Christ: "Heaven praises this day, the earth and the sea praise it, everything that is in them praises it joyfully with its song as the occasion of your coming." The language here is largely shared with the Offertory of ³⁷⁸ Helmut Gneuss identifies 8 hymnals that survive from the Anglo-Saxon period (Gneuss, "Liturgical Books," 118-9). The definitive modern treatment of the genre is found in Millful's edition of the Durham Hymnal with collation of the other works in Inge B. Millful, Hymns of the Anglo-Saxon Church (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997).

_

³⁷⁹ All hymn and verse references are found in Millful, Hymns, 190-222. The Incarnation references appear in Hymns 36.I; 38.II, IV, VII; 39.II, III, VI, 43.III, V, VI; 44.II, III, IV, VII; 45.I, V; 46.II.

³⁸⁰ Hymns 36.I, III, VI, VII; 38.I, II, V, VII; 39.I (2x); 40.III; 42(2x); 44.I, V.

³⁸¹ Hymns 36.II; 38.VI, IX; 39.VII(2x); 43.I, II; 45.II(2x); 46.III.

³⁸² Hymns 38.VII; 44.VII; 46.2

³⁸³ Hymns 36.V; 37.VIII, IX; 38.VIII, 40.V(3x); 43.I, IX

³⁸⁴ Hymn 36.V. Millful, Hymns, 192.

the Midnight Mass drawn from VgPs 95:11, 13: "Let the heavens rejoice and the earth be glad before the face of the Lord because he comes." Given this connection, the appearance of "sing a new song" (ymnum novum concinimus) later in verse V would inevitably remind a monastic audience of the opening of VgPs 95: "Sing to the Lord a new song (cantante Domino canticum novum), sing to the Lord, all the earth."

Just as the prayers for the Feast of St Stephen explored the parallels between Christ and Stephen, the hymn for the Night Office Ymnum Cantemus Domino is constructed of seven antitheses that explore the theological relationship between the incarnate Christ and the first Christian martyr:

[Let us sing]...to Christ because he was born to the world, to Stephen because he died [to the world] to Christ because he conferred life, to Stephen because he endured death, to Christ because he descended, to Stephen, because he ascended to Christ, because he came to earth, to Stephen because he went to heaven.³⁸⁵

Another hymn opens with the same exegetical observation as found in the collect for the day:

You who are holy and of great worth, first of God's martyrs, Stephen, you who were supported at every point by the miraculous strength of charity and thus prayed to the Lord for the people who were your enemies...³⁸⁶

-

³⁸⁵ Millful, Hymns, 204-205. Hymn 40.III-IV.

Thus the dominant themes drawn from the readings run across the liturgies of the monastic day.

The hymns of Epiphany focus on the concept of "manifestation" preeminently by connecting Scriptural events. The hymn Hostis Herodes Impie (actually a section of a longer hymn whose initial verses were also used as the hymn A Solis Ortu Cardine) was composed in the 5th century by Sedulius Scotus and connects several events: the star guiding the magi, ³⁸⁷ the slaughter of the innocents by Herod, ³⁸⁸ the baptism of Jesus by John in the Jordan, ³⁸⁹ a summary of healing and raising miracles, ³⁹⁰ and the changing of water to wine at Cana. ³⁹¹ The three central themes taken up by the hymn Iesus Refulgit Omnium are the magi with the star, the baptism of Jesus, and the changing of water to wine; these were also crystallized into the Gospel Antiphon used with the Magnificat at the Second Vespers of Epiphany:

We keep this day holy in honor of three miracles: on this day the star led the magi to the manger; today wine was made from water at the wedding; today in the Jordan Christ willed to be baptized by John that he might save us, alleluia.

Thus, the hymns participate in the same interpretive themes as seen in the prayers and readings of the Christmastide masses. They contribute to the seasonal focus on certain doctrines and texts, keeping them before the eyes of the worshipping community. Too, the length and scope of the hymns enable them to connect more items together than can be reliably assembled into a brief collect, extending the interpretive possibilities of the liturgy.

Summary

The liturgy was a pervasive aspect of monastic life. The seasons directed the cycles of Scriptural reading that grounded the mass and the Night Office. The selection of antiphons ³⁸⁶ Millful, Hymns, 2006. Hymn 41.I. This hymn is attributed to Eusebius Bruno (†1081) of the generation after Ælfric.

³⁸⁷ Hymn 45.II.

³⁸⁸ Hymn 45.III.

³⁸⁹ Hymn 45.IV.

³⁹⁰ Hymn 45.V.

³⁹¹ Hymn 45.VI.

and preces and the composition of prayers and hymns of the mass and office offered underdetermined interpretive possibilities. These meanings which appeared implicitly within the monastic rhythms and centrally in the mass and office appear explicitly within the homilies of the mass and office.

Chapter 4

In the next two chapters I facilitate a conversation between my four modern New Testament scholars and Ælfric of Eynsham on four passages from Matthew's gospel. I begin each section with a brief introduction to the text in question. In exploring the character of the text and its gospel parallels, I make reference to the Eusebian canons. I do this for several reasons. First, to remind modern readers that pre-critical readers were not necessarily uncritical—or unaware of shared material within the text. Second, because the Eusebian canons and accompanying canon tables were standard features of early medieval gospel books; in the era before standardized chapters and verses, lectionaries and other references used the Eusebian divisions to identify text portions. Third, Old English sermons often bring in parallels from other gospels to shed light upon the texts in focus and recent scholarship has demonstrated that the surviving Old English Gospels marked certain parallel passages to aid the exegetical process. Fourth and finally, the Eusebian divisions present a method of connecting parallel passages free from alleged modern bias concerning the Two Document hypothesis. Thus, the canons are a critical tool common to both early medieval and modern readers of Matthew

Then, I address in turn each of the four modern authors. My purpose is not to give a point by point summary of how they interpret every jot and tittle of the text, but to sketch their approach and areas of interest in broad terms. In part this approach is recommended by the diversity of the sources. For instance, Hare sometimes covers in a page what Davies and Allison require a dozen to accomplish due to the differences in purpose between these modern authors.

Once the modern authors have been surveyed, I turn my attention to Ælfric's interpretation. In each case, I begin with a reading of the sermon. Again, I am primarily looking for the main themes and angles of approach on the text but, because of the unfamiliarity of the medieval methods, I allot more space to understanding and presenting this foreign voice than to the more familiar modern ones. Once I work through Ælfric's sermon on the passage, I examine the liturgical context from which the sermon comes. This illuminates interpretive choices found in the sermons, identify interpretive themes suggested by the liturgy, and locate the sermon as one aspect within the liturgy's treatment of the Matthean text.

³⁹² Ursula Lenker, Die westsächsische Evangelienversion und die Perikopenordnungen im angelsächsiscen England (Munich: Fink, 1997).

After the interpreters have been given separate hearings, I attempt to synthesize the conversation. My goal is not to adjudicate between readings in order to select which reading is the best—or worst. After all, the point of chapter 2 was that, while similar in some respects, the modern scholarly and early medieval monastic cultures are doing different things for different purposes. Instead, my central question comes from the modern perspective: what insights can the modern academic study of the New Testament gain from the text of Matthew by engaging early medieval monastic readers on their own terms?

MATTHEW 4:1-11

Introduction

Matthew 4:1–11 relates the temptation of Jesus in the wilderness by Satan. A self-contained narrative incident, a disjunctive τότε in 4:1 separates this account from the preceding baptismal narrative (Matt 3:13–17) while a change of scene in 4:12 separates it from a summary statement on the inauguration of Jesus' public ministry (Matt 4:12–17). The text clearly comes from Q; Eusebius attributes the first verse to canon II, the Triple Tradition, recognizing Mark 1:12ff, but the next 10 are canon V, Double Tradition, only. The final verse he assigns to canon VI, Matthew and Mark. Precisely the same parallels appear in Kurt Aland's Synopsis Quattor Evangeliorum with the addition of John 1:51 as a rather questionable parallel with v. 11. Matthew has retained the Q text to a large degree making only a few minor additions.³⁹³

The thoroughly mythological character of the narrative has posed interpretive difficulties for modern scholarship. The appearance of Satan as a literal character in particular has been problematic. In an attempt to distance both Jesus and the evangelist from the passage, many scholars—led by Bultmann—have explained it as a late addition to the gospel.³⁹⁴ Kloppenborg in his Formation of Q refers to it as "something of an embarrassment" for modern Q scholars. He notes several who have sought to exclude it from Q altogether, mentioning Argyle and Lührmann. ³⁹⁵ Nevertheless, he concludes by stating: "The anomalous character of the story must however, be balanced against the strong Matthew-Luke agreements, especially in the speech portions, which in fact make the account one of the strongest of candidates for membership in Q."³⁹⁶ Following this defense, he too assigns it a late date in the formation of Q.³⁹⁷

Modern Interpreters

Ulrich Luz

Ulrich Luz reads the pericope as a mythical narrative created by the early church to interpret the baptismal narrative's identification of Jesus as Son of God. Ultimately, Luz states that "Jesus authenticates his divine sonship" by "obedience to the word of God in the OT and in this way defeats Satan." Luz is careful to state that this christological focus does not exhaust the meaning of the text; he notes that it is "indirectly open to a paranetic ³⁹³ Luke (Luke 4:1-13) changes the order of the temptations, presumably to end the temptations with a Jerusalem Temple experience.

³⁹⁴ Bultmann, History of the Synoptic Tradition, 328.

³⁹⁵ John S. Kloppenborg, The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections, Harrisburg, Penn.: Trinity, 1999 [1987], 246.

³⁹⁶ Kloppenborg, Formation of Q, 247.

³⁹⁷ Kloppenborg, Formation of Q, 247-8.

³⁹⁸ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 150.

interpretation" but prefers to leave its teaching simply at the level of demanding obedience to God's word from Christians. 400

After noting that Matthew makes very few changes to Q, Luz lays out a "brief sketch of the overall meaning" of the passage that focuses on possible meanings of the temptations; the chief categories that he sets up require a decision whether the temptations are "to be understood as universally human or as specifically messianic." He presents four possibilities:

- 1) the classical paranetic interpretation that sees Jesus overcoming common human temptations⁴⁰² with the psychological interpretation as a variant of this theme;
- 2) the christological interpretation that exists in two variants:
 - a) Jesus rejects the theios aner approach and ostentatious miracles (working from the first two temptations) and
 - b) Jesus rejects the political, Zealot understanding of the messiah (working from the third temptation);
- 3) Jesus typologically represents the true people of God living out the wilderness experience but this time in obedience—which leads back to either the paranetic or the christological; and
- 4) Jesus portrays the three dimensions of his messiahship—the prophetic, priestly, and royal.403

Luz locates himself primarily but not exclusively in option 2a. The temptations are christological in nature and focus on unpacking the events of the baptism by demonstrating ³⁹⁹ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 151.

⁴⁰⁰ Ibid.

⁴⁰¹ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 149.

⁴⁰² He specifically mentions Gregory the Great and his reading of the temptations as gula, vana gloria, and avaritia, but does not leave this interpretation in the past—Bultmann and Tuckett are recent interpreters who have followed this path. Luz, Matthew 1-7, 149 n.16.

⁴⁰³ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 149-150.

a central aspect of what it means to be Son—Jesus is obedient to the will of God as revealed in the Scriptures.

The key passage for Luz's interpretation is the third temptation which he calls "the core and highpoint of the three scenes;" ⁴⁰⁴ rather than taking the anti-Zealot approach (option 2b of his schema), he notes that Jesus does not reject the notion of political power nor even power over the world (after all, Jesus claims all authority at the Gospel's conclusion)—rather, Jesus rejects worshipping Satan. Obedience is the point of the episode: Satan is rejected, not power or authority.

An important theme appears throughout Luz's interpretation: intertextuality. Luz notes that, in an open-ended and suggestive way, this passage has underdetermined and thought-provoking ties to other parts of the gospel—particularly in the redactional elements. These connections work on a verbal level, tying episodes one to another through the use of repeated words. Thus the "high mountain" of the third temptation reminds the readers of not only the Moses narrative but also the Transfiguration—where Jesus' identity as the Beloved Son is proclaimed once again 405—and the end of the book where on a mountain 406 Jesus does claim all authority. 407

The intertextuality also functions at the thematic level. Within this text, Luz points to a number of connections between the second temptation and conflict in Jesus' life including the Passion. Interpreting the temptation as the temptation to ostentatious miracles, Luz believes that when readers encounter "Matthew's two demands for a 'sign from heaven' (16:1; cf. 12:38–39) [they] will again be reminded of this text." The temple location sets up the importance of the temple in the events of Jesus' last days. The temptation of angelic assistance and protection appears again in Gethsemane. Last but not least, the words with ⁴⁰⁴ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 153.

⁴⁰⁵ Matthew 17:5.

⁴⁰⁶ Matt 28:16.

⁴⁰⁷ Matt 28:18.

⁴⁰⁸ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 152.

which the scribes taunt the crucified Jesus repeat the devil's tempting words: "If you are the son of God, come down from the cross." Thus, the temptation episode informs the latter action in the Matthean narrative. Luz does not claim a particular purpose for this set of connections except that they underscore the obedience of Jesus in relation to temptations to act differently. 410

Davies and Allison

W. D. Davies and D. C. Allison present a thickly textured account that focuses closely on the formation of the Greek text of Matthew. Much of the space in their interpretation is devoted to identifying the language of Q and redactional elements added by Matthew or, conversely, changes to Q in Luke's parallel account. Additional space is devoted to presenting an impressive array of parallels with ancient literature, focusing particularly on apocryphal and rabbinic works. Because of this attention to technical features, a relatively small amount of the twenty-five pages is occupied with their own exegesis.

Nevertheless, the interpretation that appears is clearly identified and consistently presented throughout the analysis: The appearance of three quotations from Deut 6–8

"is the key to the narrative: we have before us a haggadic tale which has issued forth from reflection on Deut 6–8. Jesus, the Son of God, is repeating the experience of Israel in the desert (cf. Tertullian, De Bapt. 20). Having passed through the waters of a new exodus at his baptism (cf. 1 Cor 10.1–5), he enters the desert to suffer a time of testing, his forty days of fasting being analogous to Israel's forty years of wandering. Like Israel, Jesus is tempted by hunger. And, like Israel, Jesus is tempted to idolatry. All important for a right

-

⁴⁰⁹ Matt 27:40b.

⁴¹⁰ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 153.

⁴¹¹ In this passage Tertullian addresses whether the newly baptized should fast following the pattern of Jesus. Tertullian rejects this notion, saying that by fasting Jesus was casting a reproach upon Israel for its gluttony after coming through the Red Sea waters by showing the power of abstinence over gluttony. The other two temptations are not mentioned.

understanding of our pericope is Deut 8.2–3: 'And you shall remember all the way which the Lord your God has led you these forty years in the wilderness, that he might humble you, testing you to know what was in your heart, whether you would keep his commandments, or not. And he humbled you and let you hunger...'.412

Thus the first temptation is connected to the hunger of Israel in the wilderness where they grumbled and demanded food. The second temptation is linked by way of Jesus' response to the incident at Massah. The third temptation is to idolatry—a common temptation to which Israel succumbed several times the most central to the narrative being the golden calf.

Because of the focus on Jesus as a type of Israel in the wilderness, passing the trials that Israel failed, the dualism between Jesus and Satan is softened a bit. While Davies and Allison note the change in the character of Satan between the OT and the NT from an agent of the divine court to "a demonic, wholly evil figure" (adducing many texts to prove their point), they almost see Satan in this passage as reverting back to an accuser figure or, at the very least, acting as an unwitting agent of God:

As for Mt 4.1 and 3, the activity of the Spirit and the presence of Satan give the verb $\pi \epsilon_1 \rho \alpha \zeta \omega$ a double connotation: Jesus is at the same time being 'tested' by God and 'tempted' by the devil (cf. Gundry, Commentary, p.55). That is, the hostile devil, 'that slinking prompter who whispers in the heart of men' (Koran 114), is here the instrument of God."⁴¹⁷

⁴¹² Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.353.

⁴¹³ A footnote proposes that creative connections between Israel's desert experience and Ps 91 can be made through Exod 19:4 or Deut 32:10–12 but these links are not explored further. Davies and Allison, Matthew, 367 n.35.

⁴¹⁴ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.372.

⁴¹⁵ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.373.

⁴¹⁶ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.356.

⁴¹⁷ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.360.

The devil is the mechanism by which Jesus can experience in a compressed form the temptations that Israel faced. In doing so, he serves God's purpose and sets the stage for Jesus' demonstration of his obedience to God in all things.

Last, unlike several of the other commentaries, Davies and Allison make no attempt to connect the text to the Christian life, ancient or modern. There is a brief reference that identifies this pericope as the source of the "Easter fast" mentioned in the fifth canon of Nicaea, well within the realms of history-of-religion. Rather, it exemplifies a solidly scientific approach that seeks to understand the text and its backgrounds entirely within its literary contexts.

Douglas Hare

Douglas Hare offers a position very similar to Davies and Allison but presents it in a framework explicitly pointed towards modern preaching and teaching. He opens with a clear thesis:

This passage is not to be reckoned a historical narrative in the strict sense. . . . It constitutes a piece of haggadic midrash... In its present form . . . the story is less involved with the vanquishing of Satan than with the meaning of Jesus' divine Sonship. It is, in effect, a theological meditation on the baptismal narrative addressing the question: What is implied in the heavenly declaration, "This is my Son, the Beloved, in whom I am well pleased"?⁴¹⁸

The personal characteristics inherent in the baptism title are demonstrated in the temptation narrative.

Hare compares the narrative to the testing of Abraham through the common word "beloved" but he, like Davies and Allison, prefers to see Jesus as a type of the wandering Israel:

-

⁴¹⁸ Hare, Matthew, 23.

⁴¹⁹ Ibid.

The three temptations in Matthew's order reflect the chronological order of three tests faced by Israel. Whereas Israel, called "son" by God (Hos 11:1; see Deut. 8:5), failed each of the tests, Jesus demonstrates his worthiness to be the Son of God by responding to the tests with resolute faithfulness.⁴²⁰

Hare thus expands on the claim made by Davies and Allison to include chronological order. The first temptation is connected to Exod 16:1–4, the second—again, by virtue of Jesus' response—to Exod 17:1–7, and the third rather loosely to Exod 32:1–6. More than Davies and Allison, Hare works with the underlying logic of the second temptation arguing that the events at Massah were about the presence of God ('Is the LORD in our midst or not?' Exod 17:7) and about improperly challenging God. Jesus, in their place, neither questions God's promises nor takes advantage of them.

The turn to modern application comes in a brief section after the exegetical work itself. Hare notes the typical lectionary placement on the first Sunday of Lent but denies that it "is of direct relevance for Christians as they enter a period of penitence." Since modern Christians are not confronted by a physical devil or "whisked from place to place" the story has little that it can tell us. Furthermore, the specific temptations are not modern ones: "...the temptations that Jesus faces are peculiar to him; they seem very remote from those we face day by day." Hare's answer is to move to abstraction and to note that all of the temptations share a common underlying problem—choosing to treat God as less than God.

Eugene Boring

Eugene Boring presents a brief but forceful reading of this pericope that focuses less on obedience than on laying out the central conflict that continues throughout the gospel:

⁴²⁰ Hare, Matthew, 24.

⁴²¹ Hare, Matthew, 26.

⁴²² Ibid.

⁴²³ Ibid.

"Conflict with Satan is not limited to this pericope, but is the underlying aspect of the conflict between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of this world, which is the plot of the whole Gospel of Matthew."424 Such an apocalyptic reading sees the particular conflict with Satan as the root conflict driving and repeated in all of Jesus' encounters with the Jewish authorities. The readers know from this text that the leaders act as they do because they are agents of Satan playing a role in a clash of kingdoms. 425

While this emphasis on the clash of kingdoms proceeds throughout the exegesis, Boring notes that the literary form of the passage closely matches that of a haggadic tales of arguing rabbis, giving it the character of a controversy story. 426 He unites this observation with the parallel between Jesus and Israel wandering in the desert and states in his analysis of 4:2 that:

The whole story can be seen as a typological haggadic story reflecting on Deut 8:2-3 (Jesus quotes exclusively from Deuteronomy). In contrast to Israel in the wilderness, whose faith wavered until it was restored by the miraculous manna, Jesus is hungry but remains faithful without a miracle.427

Boring never again addresses the typological character of the story; it has served its function at this verse.

After the exegetical portion, Boring presents Reflections that link the exegesis with modern issues of interpretation for teaching and preaching. Here he addresses the key issue of how the story should be interpreted; he presents three ways: 1) a psychological/biological interpretation where Jesus wrestles with his calling, 2) an ethical interpretation, and 3) a christological interpretation looking not at how Jesus saw himself but how Matthew, his community, and we see Jesus. 428 He rejects the first quickly as contrary to the gospel genre, ⁴²⁴ Boring, "Matthew," 162. Emphasis in the original.

⁴²⁵ Ibid.

⁴²⁷ Boring, "Matthew," 163.

⁴²⁸ Boring, "Matthew," 165.

and dismisses the second as quickly, noting that the things Satan tempts Jesus to do were good, not evil. He clearly lands on the third, presenting this episode as an example of a kenotic Christology in Matthew. As a result, the meaning of the text for moderns is limited:

Thus we do not have in this pericope an example of a Jesus who "could have" worked miracles but chose not to do so as an ethical example for the rest of us. So understood, the text is of little help to us mortals who do not have the miraculous option. The same is true when the tempter reappears at the cross (27:40–44). To the extent that Jesus' temptation serves as a model for Christians, it might teach us that to be a "child of God" (a Matthean designation for Christians; see 5:9; cf. 28:10) means to have a trusting relationship to God that does not ask for miraculous exceptions to the limitations of an authentic Christian life.⁴²⁹

At the end of the day, then, the text presents a kenotic Christianity that underscores an apocalyptic drama that will run throughout the rest of the book. The Jewish leaders as demonic agents will again test Jesus as their leader did, but will be repulsed. The narrative of the testing as such offers no practical guidance beyond a general trust in God that does not seek the miraculous.

429 Boring, "Matthew," 166.

_

Ælfric's Interpretation

The Homily Proper

Ælfric offers a three-part interpretation of Matthew 4:1–11. He begins with an initial translation (ll. 8-26) that leads into a verse-by-verse exposition (ll. 27-137). Then he moves to a two-part section that approaches temptation more thematically, first looking at the spiritual and psychological dimensions, then locating the role of temptation within salvation history. Finally, he offers an introduction to the theology and practices of the liturgical season of Lent. The overarching theme of this interpretation is that Christ is the exemplary contemplative who overcomes the devil through the practice of virtue and the correct deployment of Scripture; following in his footsteps, Christians also have the tools to overcome temptation and emulate the virtues of Christ.

The verse-by-verse exposition begins with an initial theological question: "Now every one wonders how the devil dares to approach the Savior that he might tempt him" providing the opportunity for a theological answer: "The Savior came to mankind so that he would overcome all of our temptations with his temptation and overcome our eternal death with his temporary death." Redemption is the answer, and setting this question and answer at the head of the exposition puts everything that follows in the light of redemption.

Ælfric further unpacks the nature of the redemption, how our temptations were overcome, by summary statements that bracket the whole of this interpretive section. He begins this section by stating: "Now [the Savior] was so humble that he tolerated the devil to test him, and he permitted vile men to slay him." The concluding statement of the exegetical section is longer and clarifies that the redemptive nature of the temptation was not just Christ's victory but also his example in the face of temptation:

⁴³⁰ Ll. 28-29. Nu wundrað gehwa hu se deoful dorste genealæcan to ðam hælende þæt he hine costnode.

⁴³¹ Ll. 30-32. Se hælend com to mancynne. for ði þæt he wolde ealle ure costnunga oferswiðan. mid his costnungum: & oferswiðan urne þone ecan deað mid his hwilwendlicum deaðe.

⁴³² Ll. 32-34. Nu wæs he swa eaðmod þæt he geðafode þam deofle þæt he his fandode. & he geþafode lyþrum mannum þæt hi hine ofslogon.

Great was our Savior's humility and his endurance in this deed. He could with one word have sunk the devil into the deep abyss but he did not display his might. Rather, he answered the Devil with the holy writings and gave us an example with his endurance that as often as we suffer anything from depraved men, we should turn our mind to God's teaching more than to any revenge.⁴³³

Again, humility (eaðmodnysse) is the key virtue emphasized. Using humility in these bracketing summary statements is no accident, rather it places Ælfric's moral vision squarely within the monastic tradition; Benedict devotes the longest chapter of the Rule (ch. 7) to a discussion of the twelve steps of humility that include all other virtues ending ultimately at the perfect love of God.⁴³⁴ Ælfric is constructing Christ as the perfect moral being as defined by his monastic tradition.

An explanatory frame further clarifies Ælfric's intention. The devil is presented as being confused as to who and what Jesus is precisely because of his virtue:

The devil was in great doubt what Christ was; his life was not arranged as the lives of other men. Christ did not eat with gluttony nor did he drink to excess nor did his eyes go wandering aimlessly for lusts so that the devil pondered what he was—whether he was God's son who was promised to mankind. Then he said in his thoughts that he would test what he was.⁴³⁵

⁴³³ Ll. 132-138. Micel wæs ures hælendes eaðmodnyss. & his geðyld on þisre dæde. He mihte mid anum worde besencan þone deoful. on ðære deopan nywelnysse: ac he ne æteowde his mihte. ac mid halgum gewritum he andwyrde þam deofle. & sealde us bysne mid his geðylde. þæt swa oft swa we fram þwyrum mannum ænig ðing þrowiað: þæt we scolon wendan ure mod to godes lare swiðor þonne to ænigre wrace.

⁴³⁴ RB 7.67.

⁴³⁵ Ll. 37-42. Þam deofle wæs micel twynung hwæt crist wære: his lif næs na gelogod swa swa oðra manna lif: Crist ne æt mid gifernysse. ne he ne dranc mid oferflowednysse: ne his eagan ne mislice lustas: þa smeade se deoful hwæt he wære: hwæðer he wære godes sunu se ðe ancynne behaten wæs. Cwæð ða on his geþance þæt he fandian wolde hwæt he wære.

Jesus' moral nature is established by identifying a set of vices in which he did not participate—vices that will be revisited later in the homily: gluttony, drunkenness, and lust. We are to understand these specific vices as functioning as synecdoche for all the vices. His outward purity is specifically what attracts the devil to him.

The first temptation for Ælfric has nothing to do with either power or a messianic sign. He interprets the reaction of Jesus as being purely contrarian: "Easily could the God who turned water to wine and who worked all creation from nothing—easily could he have turned the stones to bread but he would not do anything at the devil's direction."⁴³⁶ Jesus's scriptural rebuke is glossed as describing parallel sources of sustenance: just as bread feeds the body, so "God's teaching which he set down through wise men in books"⁴³⁷ feeds the soul, making it "strong and ardent for God's will."⁴³⁸ For Ælfric, then, the indeterminate "everything that proceeds out of the mouth of the Lord" of Deut 8:3 is specifically the words recorded in Scripture. The invigorating power attributed to Scripture here further interprets Jesus' citation of Scripture in the following verses.

The second temptation concerns ostentatious miracles. Again, Ælfric takes pains—as with the previous temptation—to stress that Christ could have performed the wonder he consciously chose not to give the devil the satisfaction of doing so. Specifically, Ælfric connects it with pride in a form particularly significant within Anglo-Saxon culture—the boast (gilp):

That would be an exceedingly boastful (gilplie) deed if Christ would shoot down (though he easily could without harm—his limbs would not break who bent the arch of the high heavens) but he would not do anything for a boast (gylpe) for boasting (gilp) is a mortal sin. Therefore he would not shoot down because he rejected boasting (gilp). But he said, "Man

_

⁴³⁶ Ll. 4-50. Eaðe mihte god se ðe awende wæter to wine. & se ðe ealle gesceafta of nahte geworhte: eaðelice he mihte awendan þa stanas to hlafum: ac he nolde nan ðing doon be ðæs deofles tæcunge.

⁴³⁷ Ll. 53-54. Godes lare. be he burh wisum mannum on bocum gesette.

⁴³⁸ Ll. 57. Strang & onbryrd to godes willan.

shall not test his Lord." The man tests his Lord who trusts with foolishness and with boasts (gilpe) a certain wonderful thing will be done in God's name or who would command a certain wonder from God foolishly and without need. 439

Ælfric counters the machismo of Germanic warrior culture with another appeal to humility. However, at the same time, he issues a subtle rebuke to a danger more common within the monastery than the feasting hall; in a time when hagiography was replete with saints asking and receiving miracles of all sorts, Ælfric warns against commanding miracles from God—the kind of spiritual pride more tempting to monks than beer-hall boasting.

Ælfric spends more time on the verse the devil delivers than on Christ's countercitation. Regarding Satan's citation of Ps 91, Ælfric argues that it willfully misinterprets the verse: "Here the devil began to quote holy writings but he lied with their exposition because he is a liar and no truthfulness is in him but he is the father of all lying. This was not written concerning Christ as he had said but is written concerning holy men." Ælfric simultaneously identifies the devil's exegetical error and uses the correct interpretation to link this passage with the common Christian experience of temptation. Taking "strike your foot against a stone" morally, he parallels the testing of Christians with that of Jesus; God permits their testing as he did Jesus' but, recognizing their weakness, God sends angels to assist mortals—Jesus has no need of them.

⁴³⁹ Ll. 76-84. Þæt wære swiðe gilplic dæd. gif crist scute þa adun. þeah ðe he eaðe mihte butan awyrdnesse. his lima nyðer asceotan. se ðe gebigde þone heagan heofenlican bigels: ac he nolde nan ðincg don mid gylpe for ðan ðe se gilp is an heafodleahter: þa nolde he adun asceotan. for ðon ðe he onscunode þone gilp Ac cwæð ne sceal man his drihtnes fandian. Se man fandað his drihtnes. se ðe mid dyslicum truwan. & mid gilpe. sum wunderlic þinc on godes naman don wyle: oððe se þe sumes wundres dyslice. & butan neode. æt gode abiddan wile.

⁴⁴⁰ The poem Vainglory from the Exeter book provides a fascinating parallel to this section. The poem is a paranetic work based on the introduction to the Rule of Chrodegang where the poet describes a drunken boasting warrior, shows him growing in vice through his boasts, draws a comparison with Satan and the demonic horde who foolishly assaulted heaven due to their pride, and the boaster is referred to as "the devil's son" (feond bearn). This figure is contrasted by the man who loves humility (eaðmod leofað) and who receives the title of God's own son" (godes agen bearn). For more on boasting as it appears throughout Norse and Germanic literature, see Carol J. Clover, "The Germanic Context of the Unferþ Episode," Speculum 55 (1980): 444-68; repr. in The Beowulf Reader (N.Y., N.Y.: Garland, 2000).

⁴⁴¹ Ll. 62-65. Her began se deoful to reccenne halige gewritu. & he leah mid ðære race: for ðan þe he is leas & nan soðfæstnys nis on him: ac he is fæder ælcere leasungę. Næs þæt na gewriten be criste. þe he ða sæde: ac is awriten be halgum mannum.

[Holy men] need the help of angels in this life that the devil might not tempt them as severely as he could. So faithful is God to mankind that he has set his angels as guardians over us that they should not permit the cruel devils to destroy us. They may test us but they may not compel us to do any evil except what we do of our own will through the evil incitement of these devils. We will not be perfected unless we are tested; through the testing we may grow if we continually renounce the devil and all his teaching, if we approach our Lord with faith and love and good works, and—if anywhere we should slip—immediately we rise again and eagerly amend what was broken.⁴⁴²

Thus at the center of the temptation narrative, Ælfric uses the very text that the devil cites as an opportunity to connect the temptations of Jesus to universal temptation, and to assure those reading or hearing that God assists them with angelic help. Temptation is for the sake of progress in the spiritual life, 443 demonic forces can only tempt—not compel. 444 Even if the saints are overcome by temptation, repentance is the road back.

The third temptation falls into two parts: an explanation of the devil's claim, and an exposition on worshipping God alone. The first begins by characterizing Satan. Just as Jesus has been identified with a primary characteristic, humility, and therefore with its attendant virtues, the devil's primary characteristic is identified as presumptuousness with its attendant vices. This was what got him kicked out of heaven, and would spell his ultimate demise through Christ's passion. Ælfric explains that "he thought that he owned all earth because no

-

⁴⁴² Ll. 65-75. hi behofiað engla fultummes on ðisum life. þæt se deoful hi costnian ne mote. swa swiðe swa he wolde. Swa hold is god mancynne þæt he hæfð geset his englas us to hyrdum. þæt hy ne sceolon na geþafian þam reðum deoflum þæt hi us fordon magon. Hi moton ure afandian: ac hi ne moton us nydan to nanum yfele: buton we hit sylfe agenes willan doon þurh ða yfelan tyhtincge þæs deofles. We ne beoð na fulfremede: butan we beon afandode: þurh ða fandunge we sceolon geðeon. gif we æfre wiðsacað deofle & eallum his larum. & gif we genealæcað urum drihtne mid geleafan. & lufe. & godum weorcum: gif we hwær aslidon arison eft þærrihte. & betan georne þæt ðær tobrocen byð.

⁴⁴³ Several passages in the Rule allude to this including RB Prol.28 and also—from the steps of humility—RB 7.35-41.

⁴⁴⁴ See John Cassian, Conf., 7.8.1-3.

man could stand against him before Christ came who conquered him"⁴⁴⁵ He notes that Scripture records God's possession of all creation in Ps 24:1 and that all creation clearly worships him except for evil men—those who exhibit lives of vice rather than virtue—and who thereby reject their creator.

Ælfric appeals to the Old Testament with its repeated prohibitions of idolatry, but once again ties God's worthiness for worship to his status as Creator: "It is written in the old law that no man shall pray to any devil-idol nor to anything except God alone because no creation is worthy of this dignity but rather the One alone who created all things." He goes on to explain that saints are not worshiped; rather, "We ask intercessions from holy men that they should intercede for us to their Lord and to our Lord. We do not pray, however, to them just as we do to God. They will not permit it..." This is grounded by the angel's rejection of John's worship in Rev 22:8–9.

After his commentary, Ælfric turns to a two-part section that examines the mechanisms of demonic temptation. The first examines the mental and psychological means by which it occurs, and examines how it failed in this particular scenario; the second reveals the meaning of this episode in the scope of salvation history. The two parts are related to one another primarily by topic and schematization but the language of the first appears in the second, showing how these mechanisms were operative in practice.

The first examines the psychology of temptation. Following the idea that devils cannot compel evil deeds, Ælfric presents a three-step process (basically paraphrasing James 1:12-15) that explains how compulsion occurs. The devil entices his victim; the victim then desires the evil. Sin occurs when the victim then consents to what his mind desires. Thus,

⁴⁴⁵ Ll. 94-95. Him ðuhte þæt he ahte ealne middaneard. for ðon þe him ne wiðstod nan man ær ðan ðe crist com: þe hyne gewylde

⁴⁴⁶ Ll. 116-119. Hit is awriten on ðære ealdan æ. þæt nan mann ne sceal hine gebiddan to nanum deofelgylde. ne to nanum þinge buton to gode anum. for ðon þe nan gesceaft nis wyrðe þæs wyrðmyntes buton se ana. se ðe scyppend is ealra þinga.

⁴⁴⁷ Ll. 120-123. We biddað þingunga æt halgum mannum þæt hi sceolon us þingian to heora drihtne & to urum drihtne: Ne gebidde we na þeahhwæðere us to him swa swa we to gode doð: ne hi þæt geþafian nellað:

what is external—the enticement—is met by an internal movement—desire (which is original sin)⁴⁴⁸—then consent may occur. Ælfric explains that in the case of Christ, the temptations failed because: "The Savior was not tempted in this way because he was born without sin from a maiden and had nothing perverse within him."⁴⁴⁹ Because of the fact of the incarnation, Christ had no desire to sin that could be awakened by diabolic enticement and therefore did not consent nor fall into sin.

The second section presents a reading that could be dismissed as typological but, in fact, reveals not simply typology but narrative reversal. Returning to Genesis, Ælfric states that the devil tempted Adam with three temptations:

Through gluttony [Adam] was overcome when he ate the forbidden apple through the devil's teaching. Through vainglory he was overcome when he believed the devil's words that "You will be as excellent as the angels if you eat of this tree" and they believed his lies and, with idle boasts, wished to be better than how they were created—but became worse. With greediness he was overcome when the devil said to him: "You will have knowledge of both good and evil"—for greediness is not only for wealth but is also in the desire for greater dignity. 450

The garden narrative is reordered for the sake of putting these three temptations in the order in which the devil deployed them in the encounter with Jesus in the wilderness. The temptation of Jesus presents him overturning the original fall by resisting these three primal temptations: the bread temptation is gluttony; the temple, vainglory; the temptation of the ⁴⁴⁸ See Ll. 143-145. "Often man's mind will be inclined to this desire—and sometimes it will fall into consent because we are born of sinful flesh." Oft þæs mannes mood gebiged to ðære lustfullunge: Hwilon eac aslit to ðære geþafunge. for ðon þe we sind of synfullum flæsce acennede.

⁴⁴⁹ Ll. 145-147. Næs na se hælend on ða wisan gecostnod. for ðan þe he wæs of mædene acenned buton synne. & næs nan ðincg þwyrlices on him.

⁴⁵⁰ Ll. 157-165. Þurh gifernysse he wæs oferswyðed þa ða he þurh deofles lare æt þone forbodenan æppel. Þurh ydelum wuldre he wæs oferswiðed: þa ða he gelyfde þæs deofles wordum þa ða he cwæð. Swa mære ge beoð swa swa englas gif ge of ðam treowe etað: & hi ða gelyfdon his leasungum. & woldon mid ydelum gylpe beon beteran þonne hi gesceapene wæron. Þa wurdon hi wyrsan. Mid gitsunge he wæs oferswiðed. Þa þa se deofol cwæð him to: & ge habbað gescad ægðer ge godes ge yfeles. Nis na gitsung on feo anum: ac is eac on gewilnunge micelre geðincgðe.

riches of the nations is greed. Thus, Ælfric once again returns to the notion of redemption by exposing the scope of the victory. This story is not simply about Jesus besting the devil; it is a story about the new Adam resisting and overcoming both the temptations and the tempter who felled the first Adam.

The final portion of the homily connects this text to the liturgical observance of Lent. The ostensible point of connection is with the time span; Ælfric begins by noting that Christ fasted for forty days and nights—a superhuman achievement only possible through "the great might of his divinity through which he might have lived his whole life without earthly food had he wished it." This is contrasted with Moses and Elijah who accomplished the same feat only through the miraculous intervention of God.

Then Ælfric moves to contemporary practice of his hearers: the forty-day fast of Lent in imitation of Christ. He is not content with explaining the period by appealing to the length of the temptation, rather, he connects it back to the Levitical law of tithing:

Why is this fast calculated as forty days? A whole year has three hundred and sixty-five days. Then, if we take a tenth of the year's days, then there are thirty-six tithe days and from this day until Holy Easter there are forty-two days. Taking then the six Sundays from the total, 452 there are thirty-six of the year's tithe days for us to observe with restraint. Just as God's Law commands that we should pay a tenth of all things from our year's toil to God, so we should also in these tithing-days tithe our bodies with restraint to the praise of God. 453

⁴⁵¹ Ll. 178-180. ða miclan mihte: his godcundnysse: þurh ða he mihte on eallum þisum andweardan life buton eorðlicum mettum lybban. gif he wolde.

⁴⁵² Sundays are subtracted from the length of the fast because according to Christian practice from the earliest days no Sunday could be a fast day. See in reference to this Canon 20 of the First Council of Nicaea. (Cassian mentions this indirectly in Conf. 21.11.)

⁴⁵³ Ll. 189-199. Hwi is þis fæsten þus geteald: þurh feowertig daga. On eallum geare sind getealde þreo hund daga & fif & sixtig daga. Þonne gif we teoðiað þas gearlican dagas. Þonne beoð þær six & þrittig teoðincgdagas: & fram þisum dæge oð ðam halgum easterdæge: Sind twa & feowertig daga: do þonne þa six sunnandagas of ðam getæle. Þonne beoð þa six & þrittig. Þæs geares teoðingdagas us to forhæfednysse getealde.

Swa swa godes .æ. us bebyt þæt we scolon ealle þa ðinc þe us gescotað of ures geares teolunge gode þa eoðunge syllan: Swa we scolon eac on ðisum teoðingdagum urne lichaman mid forhæfednysse gode to lofe teoðian.

This interpretation seems to move his discussion away from the gospel pericope; the return is implicit in the following discussion of the nature of a true fast:

Put away all strife and all quarreling and keep this time with peace and with true love for no fast is acceptable to God unless you reconcile and do just as God teaches. Break your loaf and give the other portion to hungry men and lead into your house the destitute and poor and foreigners and cheer them with your goods. When you see the naked, clothe them and do not overlook your own flesh. The man who fasts without almsgiving—he is sparing in his meat but afterwards eats what he previously set aside with restraint—this fast mocks God. If you wish your fast to be acceptable to God then help poor men with the portion which you withhold from yourself—and with more also if it is possible.⁴⁵⁴

This explanation, thick with biblical quotations and allusions, is strongly reminiscent of Benedict's description of the Tools of Good Works, listed exhaustively in RB 4. Ælfric makes clear—following monastic tradition—that fasting is not fundamentally about self-denial but rather is a pathway for cultivating the virtues in direct action on behalf of the poor and needy.

Ælfric concludes both this section and his homily with a warning for those who fast for the sake of spiritual pride:

And so that we may do well, let us do this without boasts and idle praise. The man who does good in order to boast praises himself, he does not receive any reward from God, rather receives his punishment. But let us do just as God teaches so that our good works might be known by wise men, that they may see our goodness and that they may marvel and praise ⁴⁵⁴ Ll. 203-213. Lætað aweg. ealle saca. & ælc geflit. & gehealdað þas tid mid sibbe. & mid soðre lufe: For ðon ne bið nan fæsten gode andfenge buton sybbe. & doð swa swa god tæhte. Tobræc ðinne hlaf: & syle ðone oðerne dæl: hungrium menn. & læd into ðinum huse. wædlan. & þa earman. ælfremedan menn: & gefrefra hi mid ðinum godum. Þonne ðu nacodne geseo: scryd hine. & ne forseoh ðin agen flæsc. Se mann þe fæst butan ælmessan: he deð swilce he sparige his mete. & eft. ett þæt he ær mid forhæfdnysse foreode: ac þæt fæsten tælð god. Ac gif ðu fæstan wille gode to gecwemednysse. Þonne gehelp ðu earmra manna mid þam dæle ðe ðu ðe sylfum oftihst: & eac mid maran gif ðe to onhagie.

-

our heavenly Father, God Almighty, who rewards us with a hundredfold what we do for poor men for love of him who lives and reigns without end. Amen. 455

Again, a cluster of biblical images⁴⁵⁶ concludes the homily, giving a strong warning against spiritual self-seeking. Fasting and good works are done for the worship and praise of God—for the glorification of God, not self. What of boasting? It is excluded.

While Ælfric's work falls into clearly discernable sections, common themes and common language hold it together. The central theme is the struggle of virtue and vice, and Christ's pattern of virtue as the chief exemplar of the Christian life. The temptation narrative is described as a victory of virtue over vice. In the same way the season of Lent is specifically identified as a time to set aside dissolute and inattentive living for the sake of cultivating virtue through good works performed on behalf of the poor for the glorification of God.

In terms of language, two key terms stitch the sections together. The first highlights the theme of redemption as it runs throughout the explication: overcoming (oferswiðan). The term appears twice in Ælfric's initial summary of the events, at the conclusions of the explications of the first two temptations, and throughout the narrative reversal section—the devil overcomes Adam three times, then Christ overcomes the devil thrice as well.

The second repeated term is a little more unusual. It is a vice that Ælfric constantly cautions against: boasting, arrogance, or pride (gielp). It occurs in the exegetical section primarily in the discussion of the second temptation but reappears in Adam's temptation to pride and again at the end as the vice that can render fasting invalid or even harmful to the soul. Its constant repetition seems to identify it as a particularly pernicious sin whose remedy is none other than the chief characteristic attributed to Christ—humility.

-

⁴⁵⁵ Ll. 220-227. And swa hwæt swa we doð to goode: uton don þæt buton gylpe. & idelre herunge. Se man þe for gilpe hwæt to goode deð: him sylfum to herunge: næfð he ðes nane mede æt gode: ac hæfð his wite. Ac uton don swa swa god tæhte: þæt ure goodan weorc beon. on ða wison mannum cuðe: þæt hi magon geseon ure godnysse: & þæt hi wuldrian. & herion urne heofenlican fæder god ælmihtinne: se ðe us forgilt mid hundfealdum swa hwæt swa we doð earmum mannum for his lufon: se ðe leofað & rixað a butan ende. AMEN.

⁴⁵⁶ Primarily Matthean images, weaving together Matt 6:1, 5:16, 13:8.

The Liturgical Context

The chief factor that determines Ælfric's interpretation of this text is its lectionary setting. Matthew 4:1–11 only appears in Ælfric's lectionary on this occasion and no other text is ever substituted for it; Matthew's temptation is unique to the First Sunday in Lent. As a result, it is inextricably bound with the meaning and the practices of Lent. The third section of Ælfric's homily, in fact, flows from this close connection. A discussion of the practices of Lent is an explanation of the passage's practical meaning since the text is inseparable from the season.

The Gospel lectionary is not the only cycle of readings that has had a major effect upon Ælfric's interpretation of the passage. Equally important is Paul the Deacon's homiliary that appointed Gregory the Great's Homily 14 as the reading for the third nocturn of the Night Office. ⁴⁵⁸ As Godden's magisterial source-commentary amply demonstrates, ⁴⁵⁹ most of Ælfric's second and third sections are adaptations of Gregory. Ælfric shortens Gregory's text, often removing redundant explanations, ⁴⁶⁰ but largely follows the points that Gregory makes. What Godden does not make clear is that Gregory's text in the portion represented by Ælfric's second section is itself a paraphrase and adaptation of John Cassian's Conf. 5.6. While drawing on Gregory directly, Ælfric is remaining securely within the main channels of monastic interpretation of this text.

Ælfric's major change to the shape of Gregory's homily is the introduction of an exegetical section. Gregory's homily on Matt 4:1–11 is anomalous in this regard; where he usually presents a line-by-line exeges of the text, this homily is largely thematic. Thus, ⁴⁵⁷ Luke's parallel does not appear in the lectionary, nor does Mark's verse-long version.

⁴⁵⁸ This is numbered as Homily 16 in Migne's Patrologia Latina. See p. Ch 2 on the numbering discrepancies. Gregory's text appears as number 76 in Smetna's list of Paul's original homiliary; it is number 64 in Migne's version.

⁴⁵⁹ Godden, Commentary, 84-94.

 $^{^{460}}$ For instance, Gregory has several explanations for the number forty—including multiplying the four elements by the ten commandments—that &lfric does not include.

Ælfric turns to the liturgical homiliaries of Hericus and Haymo for needed amplification, and brings in his own material as well.⁴⁶¹

Three major features of the liturgies appoint for the First Sunday in Lent help contextualize Ælfric's sermon. The first is the dominance of VgPs 90 within the propers of the Mass of the Day and its reappearance within the Office materials during Lent. The second is the liturgical placement and interpretation of Adam's Fall in Genesis. The third is the use of the Epistle within the Little Hours as a means to stitch together the cycles of Mass and Office and to emphasize the theological point found by medieval liturgists within the Epistle.

The sung propers for the Mass of the Day for the First Sunday in Lent exhibit two unusual characteristics: they all come from a single source, VgPs 90, and they contain an abnormally long tract, probably the longest in the whole gradual. The marginal notes of the Leofric Missal that identify the portions of the Mass not included in the text of the book give neumed incipits—the opening words of the propers with the notes that begin each melody. The introit antiphon and psalm verse link the last (vv. 15-16) and first verses of the psalm:

Ant: He called upon me and I will hear him, I will deliver him and glorify him. I will fill him with length of days.

Ps: He who dwells in the help of the Most High will remain in the protection of the God of heaven. Glory be...

⁴⁶¹ Haymo's Hom. 28 is itself a reworking of Gregory's text.

⁴⁶² This statement is certainly true for the Tridentine Gradual and, as noted in ch. 3, although no gradual survives from Anglo-Saxon England the evidence that does survive and the conservative character of the gradual through time (Vogel calls the Roman Antiphonary "exceptionally stable" (Vogel, Medieval Liturgy, 358.))make it likely that this was the case then as well.

⁴⁶³ The neumed incipits give the first notes and the first words, assuming that the monks had memorized the full tune and its words.

Ant: He called upon me...464

The gradual that comes between the Epistle and the Tract contains the very words quoted by the devil to Jesus from vv. 11-12:

R: God commanded his angels concerning you, that they will guard you in all of your ways.

V: In their hands they will bear you, lest you strike your foot against a stone. 465

This is followed by the massive Tract. 466 This tract which immediately precedes the reading of the Gospel contains virtually all of VgPs 90, lacking only vv. 8-10. The Offertory and the Communion are identical but for a single word: "[The Lord/He] will overshadow you with his wings and you shall trust under his pinions; his truth will encircle you like a shield."

The liturgy makes one major change from the Scriptural text—in a number of places it puts into the perfect tense verbs that appear in the psalm as future. Exactly where, how and why this happens is unclear; the critical apparatus to the psalm notes that while most texts followed the Greek with a future, some manuscripts used the perfect; whether this reflects the liturgy utilizing or effecting the textual tradition is unclear. In any case, the marginal notes of the Leofric Missal contain three shifts from future to perfect: Invocabit to Invocavit in the Introit Antiphon and Tract, liberabit to liberavit in the Tract, and Scuto circumdabit to Scuto circumdedit. This grammatical shift requires a reassessment of the psalm's meaning. Singing the psalm as written in the future tense would suggest that the primary referent of the "you" in the psalm would be the individual singing it as the saving acts of God described are promised events that would occur in the future. The shift to the past tense does not preclude this possibility and introduces the possibility that Jesus undergoing ⁴⁶⁴ While the Leofric Missal only contains the incipts: "A. Inuocauit me/PS. Qui habitat" (Orchard, Leofric, 129. Item 516.) the stability of the Antiphonary is confirmed by the correspondence of both the Sarum Missal and the Tridentine Missal in containing the same versions of the referenced verses.

⁴⁶⁵ R. Angelis suis./V. In manibus portabunt. Ibid.

⁴⁶⁶ TR. Qui habitat./V. Dicet domino./V. Quoniam ipse liberauit/V. Scapulis suis./V. Scuto circumdedit./V. A sagitta uolante./V. Cadent a latere/V. Quoniam angelis suis./V. In manibus portabunt./V. Super aspidem./V. Quoniam in me sperauit./V. Invocauit me, eripiam. Ibid.

⁴⁶⁷ OF. Scapulis suis./CO. Scapulis suis. Ibid. The version of the text in the Communion lacks "Dominus".

the Temptation may also be the referent. Understood in this fashion, the tense change represents the deliberate introduction of an ambiguity into the psalm's text to expand its exegetical scope.

Similarly, the excision of three verses from the middle of the psalm in the Tract renders it both closer to the Gospel narrative and simultaneously more reflective of the monastic spiritual experience as described in Ælfric's sermon. The verses removed have a triumphalist tone that assure the ones singing them that "truly your eyes will consider and you will see the retribution of the sinners" (VgPs 90:8) and also that "no evil will approach you" (VgPs 90:10a). Indeed, the last must be repudiated as the Gospel narrative directly contradicts it, describing the Devil himself approaching Jesus! With these verses removed, the Tract portrays the psalm as a strong promise of God's support and comfort, but it no longer promises complete security from evil.

When the entirety of this psalm is thus juxtaposed with the Gospel, a number of details from the psalm take on a whole new specificity. Not only is the psalm about the protection that God offers the community in its temptations but suddenly the "daemonio meridiano" of VgPs 90:6 is not just any noonday devil but the Devil himself; the menagerie of verse 13 are not just the fierce and venomous—they are the downright demonic especially when cross-referenced with 1 Peter 5:8, 468 Rev 12:9, and Gen 3.

This psalm does not only appear in the Mass propers, however. Key verses appear in key places in the Office and become seasonal texts, repeated daily through Lent until Passiontide. The Portiforium of St Wulstan has a familiar set of verses as the three versicles and responses that conclude the psalms of the three nocturns of the Night Office:

V. He has overshadowed⁴⁶⁹ you with his wings. R. And you shall trust under his pinions.

⁴⁶⁸ This connection between the lion and the Devil would be a quite natural one as these two texts are daily juxtaposed in Compline—the 1 Peter verse is the little chapter of the ante-office and VgPs 90 is one of the fixed psalms.

⁴⁶⁹ Note the shift from future to perfect again.

V. His truth will encircle you as a shield. R. You will not fear the terror of the night.

V. In their hands they will carry you. R. Lest you strike your foot against a stone. 470

From this point forward, the first versicle and response become the daily versicle and response that opens the office of Lauds; the protection promised by this psalm becomes a daily reminder throughout Lent. Similarly, the set versicle and response after the hymn each Vespers are the very words quoted by the Devil: "V. He has commanded his angels concerning you. R. To keep you in all of your ways." The words intended as a temptation in Matthew now function as a reminder to the community of divine assistance during their Lenten temptations.

Thus, when Ælfric explains how Satan has misused Scripture, the correct reading of the psalm is derived directly from the liturgy. He refers to it when he states, "This was not written concerning Christ as he had said but is written concerning holy men." Monastics following the Rule would have had an intimate familiarity with this psalm, since it was one of the three invariable psalms used daily at Compline. Furthermore, its use and repetition at key points throughout Lent would have further cemented its application to the gathered worshipping community.

Turning to the biblical lectionary for the Night Office, Ælfric's second section that parallels the temptation of Adam with that of Christ would have found fruitful ground in the soil of his monastic hearers. According to the schedule that he presents in the LME (and following the older tradition of OR XIII), ⁴⁷⁴ the monks would have begun reading Genesis ⁴⁷⁰ Anselm Hughes, The Portiforium of Saint Wulstan (Corpus Christi College Cambridge ms. 391), (Henry Bradshaw Society 89; London: Henry Bradshaw Society, 1958) 27, 28. Items 443-445, 465.

⁴⁷¹ Hughes, Portiforium, 27, 28, 29. Item 439.

⁴⁷² Ll. 64-5.

⁴⁷³ RB 18.19.

⁴⁷⁴ On the nature and relationship of these two biblical lectionaries for the Night Office see ch. 3.

just three Sundays before at Septuagesima; 475 the temptation narrative would have remained fresh in their minds.

Furthermore, the responsories of Sexagesima place a spin on the Adam and Eve narrative that underscore Ælfric's fundamentally monastic reading of this text. As Genesis was read, a set of responsories was repeated throughout the week of Sexagesima that interpreted the events of the creation and fall of humanity. Responsories for non-sanctoral liturgical occasions were almost invariably direct Scripture citations. The selection and repetition of certain passages would then frame the narrative, providing the monastic hearer with a premade set of biblical lenses through which to view the biblical narrative. A representative set⁴⁷⁶ of ten responsories for Sexagesima contain four that conflate the creation of the cosmos with the creation of Adam and describe God placing Adam in the garden. 477 The next two introduce the need for Eve—based in finding a companion for Adam—and her creation from Adam. 478 The Fall story itself is entirely absent: there is no serpent, Eve never appears as a character, fruit never appears to be plucked or eaten. Instead, the liturgy moves directly to three responsories that describe the aftermath of the fall. The first describes Adam hiding himself from God. 479 The second describes God's curse of humanity and contains the only non-biblical interpolation within this set:

In sudore vultus (CAO 6937)

R: "In the sweat of your brow you will feed on your bread," said the Lord to Adam. "When you work the ground it will not give you its fruits, but it will grow spines and thorns for you."

⁴⁷⁵ Jones, LME, 145. LME 70: "...in Septuagesima we should read Genesis until mid-Lent..." (Exodus begins at mid-Lent). See OR XIIIa.1: "In the beginning of Septuagesima they place the Heptateuch until the fourteenth day before Easter."

⁴⁷⁶ Since no antiphoners for the Night Office survive from Anglo-Saxon England, we must rely on other representative books from a similar time and milieu. St. Gallen, Stiftsbibliothek, Cod. Sang. 390 is exactly contemporary with Ælfric having been written between 990 and 1000 and was intended for a Benedictine monastery like Ælfric's. Too, its contents match the incipit clues to the required responsories in the LME. ⁴⁷⁷ CAO 6925, CAO 6928, CAO 6739, and CAO 7798.

⁴⁷⁸ CAO 6473 and CAO 6883.

⁴⁷⁹ CAO 6537.

V: "Because you obeyed the voice of your wife more than mine, cursed be the earth regarding your works. It will grow..."

A pastiche of Gen 3:19, 18, 17, it introduces the idea that the fall was fundamentally about obedience and whom Adam obeyed. Note what the responsory does and does not say: it does not blame Eve for the Fall. Nor does it blame the serpent or Satan. Instead, the fault is clearly located with Adam. Adam chose disobedience. This understanding—that disobedience is the root of the Fall—is a consistent theme throughout Ælfric's writings⁴⁸¹ and has a tremendous impact on his thought and his construction of the New Adam.

The Epistle, 2 Cor 6:3–7, plays a role beyond its use at Mass. While it is read in its entirety only at Mass, it enters into the fabric of the Office as well, and the Office's selection of verses from it help focus exegetical attention upon a certain set of Paul's sufferings that become programmatic Lenten disciplines. Godden notes one point in particular⁴⁸² where Ælfric draws in 2 Cor 6:3–7, but this is the only overt appearance the passage makes in the homily. In the liturgy, however, it appears as the little chapters for Vespers I, Terce, ⁴⁸⁴ Sext, ⁴⁸⁵ and therefore at Terce and Sext through the week. It appears in versicles for Vespers I, ⁴⁸⁶ and the antiphon for Prime. ⁴⁸⁷ Again, three of the common responsories adapted passages from the Epistle. The first combines verses 2b, 4b, 5b and 7b:

⁴⁸⁰ CAO 6937 In sudore vultus tui vesceris pane tuo, dixit Dominus ad Adam; cum operatus fueris terram, non dabit fructus suos, sed spinas et tribulos germinabit tibi. Emphasis added to identify the interpolation. V. A. Pro eo quod oboedisti voci uxoris tuae plus quam me, maledicta terra in opere tuo. Sed spinas.

⁴⁸¹ A clear example is his explanation of the Fall in ÆCHom I, 1 ll. 155-9. Clemoes, Catholic Homilies: 1, 184: "It was not fated by God nor were [the first parents] forced to break God's command but God gave them freedom and gave them their own choice so they could be obedient [gehyrsum] or disobedient [ungehyrsum]—but they were obedient [gehyrsum] to the Devil and disobedient [ungehyrsum] to God. They entrusted themselves and all humanity after this life to hell-dwellers and the Devil who led them astray." (Næs him gesceapen fram gode. ne he næs genedd þæt he sceolde godes bebod tobrecan. ac god hine let frigne. & sealde him agenne cyre. swa he wære gehyrsum. swa he wære ungehyrsum. He wearð þa deofle gehyrsum. & gode ungehyrsum. & wearð betæht he & eal mancynn æfter ðisum life into hellewite. mid þam deofle ðe hine forlærde.)

⁴⁸² This appears at Ll. 200-202: "...after the apostle's teaching in great patience and in holy vigils, in fasting, in chastity of mind and body..." begnas æfter ðæs apostoles tæcunge: on miclum geþylde: & on halgum wæccum: on fæstenum: on clænnysse. modes & lichaman.

⁴⁸³ 2 Cor 6:1–2a; Hughes, Portiforium, 27. Item 436.

⁴⁸⁴ 2 Cor 6:2b-3; Ibid. Item 454.

⁴⁸⁵ 2 Cor 6:4; Ibid. Item 457.

⁴⁸⁶ 2 Cor 6:6b; Ibid. Item 437.

Ecce nunc tempus acceptabile (CAO 6600)

R. Behold, now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation. Let us commend ourselves with much patience, with many fasts, through the weapons of righteousness of the power of God.

V. In all things let us present ourselves as servants of God that our ministry may not be slandered. Through the weapons of righteousness of the power of God. 488

The second utilizes verses 4a, 3b, 2b, and 3a:

In omnibus exhibeamus (CAO 6920)

R. In all things let us present ourselves as servants of God with much patience that our ministry may not be slandered.

V. Behold, now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation. Giving no one any offense. That our ministry may not be slandered. 489

The last incorporates verses 2b and 3a:

Paradisi portas aperuit (CAO 7348)

R. The time of our fasting opened the gates of heaven; let us accept them, praying and supplicating, that on the day of resurrection we might rejoice with the Lord.

V. Behold, now is the acceptable time; behold, now is the day of salvation. Giving no one any offense. That on the day of resurrection we might rejoice with the Lord. ⁴⁹⁰

⁴⁸⁷ 2 Cor 6:7; Ibid. Item 453.

⁴⁸⁸ Hesbert, CAO, 4.154. Item 6600. Ecce nunc tempus acceptabile, ecce nunc dies salutis: commendemus nosmetipsos in multa patientia, in jejuniis multis, per arma justitiae virtutis Dei.

V. In omnibus exhibeamus nosmetipsos sicut Dei ministros, ut non vituperetur ministerium nostrum. - Per ⁴⁸⁹ Hesbert, CAO, 4.232. Item 6920. In omnibus exhibeamus nos sicut Dei ministros in multa patientia, ut non vituperetur ministerium nostrum. V. A. Ecce nunc tempus acceptabile, ecce nunc dies salutis, nemini dantes ullam offensionem. - Ut non.

Hesbert, CAO, 4.336-7. Item 7348. Paradisi portas aperuit nobis jejunii tempus; suscipiamus illud, orantes et deprecantes, ut in die resurrectionis cum Domino gloriemur. V. A. Ecce nunc tempus acceptabile, ecce nunc dies salutis, nemini dantes ullam offensionem. - Ut in die.

When the Genesis connection is read christologically, Gen 3:15 in particular stands out referring back again to a physical overcoming of Satan which illuminates the language of scuto—"shield"—in VgPs 90:5 which, in correspondence with the idea of sagitta in the following verse, conjures up both Eph 6:11-18 (especially v. 16) and 2 Cor 6:7. The 2 Cor passage, in turn, is reconceptualized not as a description of the hardships that Paul and his companions suffered for the sake of the Corinthians to establish the trustworthiness of their mission against other traveling missionaries and preachers. 491 Rather, the list of hardships are not literal hardships but ascetic practices to be undertaken at this specific time—preeminent among them "much patience...in vigils and fastings," practices which are themselves the "arms of righteousness", used to conquer the Devil, his minions, and their temptations.

Indeed, following this logic, connecting the first of the three responsories above with a passage from the third section of Ælfric's homily is most instructive. Responsory CAO 6600 shares more than a passing resemblance to lines 196-201:

Just as God's law commands that we should give a tenth of all things from our year's toiling to God, so we should also in these tithing-days tithe our bodies with restraint to the praise of God. We should prepare ourselves in all things just as God's thanes after the apostle's teaching in great patience and in holy vigils, in fasting, in chastity of mind and body...⁴⁹⁴

Ælfric, like the responsory, begins with a discussion of time, then transitions to the necessary preparations of ascetical activity, reminding his hearers that they should be God's thanes. Within Anglo-Saxon religious discourse, "thanes" typically refers to disciples—the Twelve but is borrowed from secular discourse where a lord's thanes were his retainers, usually ⁴⁹¹ Cite standard 2 Cor commentary on this point.

^{492 ...}multa patientia... in vigiliis in ieiuniis... 2 Cor 6:4, 5.

⁴⁹³ Arma iustitiae. 2 Cor 6:7.

⁴⁹⁴ Ll. 197-201. Swa swa godes .æ. us bebyt þæt we scolon ealle þa ðinc þe us gescotað of ures geares teolunge gode þa teoðunge syllan: Swa we scolon eac on ðisum teoðingdagum urne lichaman mid forhæfednysse gode to lofe teoðian. We sculon us gearcian on eallum þingum swa swa godes þegnas æfter ðæs apostoles tæcunge: on miclum gebylde: & on halgum wæccum: on fæstenum: on clænnysse. modes & lichaman.

armed retainers who followed him into battle. From that point Ælfric continues with the 2 Cor passage into a discussion of chastity. While Ælfric may or may not be consciously quoting the responsory, there is no doubt that a common interpretive method lies behind both.

The liturgy simultaneously grounds and transmits this interpretive method. The major themes of the foregoing discussion are neatly summarized in a single liturgical text, the episcopal benediction that ends the mass set for Lent 1 in the Leofric Missal:

May the Omnipotent God bless you (pl.), he who consecrated for the fast the number forty through Moses and Elijah and likewise our mediator [Christ], and grant you (pl) accordingly to steward this present life like the denarius received from the master of the household as a reward,⁴⁹⁷ traversing through to the forgiveness of all sins and to the glorious resurrection with all of the saints. Amen.

And may he give you (pl.) the spiritual power of the invincible weapons—which is the example of the Lord—that you may mightily subdue the exceedingly keen⁴⁹⁸ temptations of the ancient enemy. Amen.

In regard to him in whom a man may not live on bread alone, but in all the words that proceed from his mouth receive spiritual food, through the observation of this fast and the example of other good works, may we be worthy to attain to the imperishable crown of glory. Amen.⁴⁹⁹

⁴⁹⁵ See, for example, the 27 references to þegn, -as in Mitchell and Robinson's edition of Beowulf.

⁴⁹⁶ It is both interesting and suggestive—but again not conclusive—that a few lines later Ælfric quotes Isa 58:7 which is also used on this occasion as the responsary Frange esurienti panem tuum (Hesbert, CAO, 4.187. Item 6744.).

⁴⁹⁷ The reference is to Matt 20: 1–16, the parable of the workmen in the vineyard, which was unanimously connected to Septuagesima, the solemnity three weeks earlier that began the pre-Lenten period.

⁴⁹⁸ Again, the root of "most keen"—sagacissima—is virtually a homonym with "arrows"—sagitta—invoking VgPs 90:6 and Eph 6:16.

⁴⁹⁹ Benedicat uobis omnipotens deus, qui quadragenarium numerm in moysi et heliae, necnon et mediatoris nostri ieiunio consecrauit, concedatque uobis ita transigere presentis uitę dispensatsionem, ut accepto a patre familias remunerationis denario, perueniatis ad peccatorum omnium remissionem, et ad gloriosam cum sanctis omnibus resurrectionem. Amen.

This concluding prayer brings together at least three themes in play between the liturgy and Ælfric's homily: 1) the numerology of the Lenten time-span is both literal and typological, echoing the fasts of Moses and Elijah, and consummated in Jesus; 2) in a resounding echo of RB 49.1⁵⁰⁰ the Christian life and hope of salvation is connected with the behavior consistent with a holy Lent 3) the spiritual weapons of 2 Cor 6:7 are interpreted in light of this Gospel text and conflated with the imitation of Christ.

Thus, with these liturgical connections between the appointed Psalm, Epistle, and Gospel in mind, Ælfric's third section on the time and ascetical practices of Lent appear much more thematically and exegetically linked to his first two sections. It is not simply an add-on that gives information about the liturgical season getting underway; it also presents the practices that allow the community to directly participate in Christ's conquest of the Devil through his temptations by linking their common temptations to Christ's.

Detque uobis spiritalium uirtutum inuictricia arma, quibus exemplo domini deuincere ualeatis antiqui hostis sagacissima temptamenta. Amen.

Qui non in solo pane uiuit homo, sed in omni uerbo quod de ore eius procedit spiritalem sumentes alimoniam, per ieiuniorm observationem et ceterorum bonorum operum exhibitionem, percipere mereamini inmarcescibilem gloriae coronam. Amen. Orchard, Leofric, 130. Item 522.

⁵⁰⁰ "The life of a monk ought to be a continual Lent." Fry, RB, 253.

Discussion

One of the strategies common to both moderns and medievals for making sense of this narrative was casting it in relation to an OT narrative. The response to the mythological is an appeal to the typological. It is interesting, however, that they choose different directions in which to head. While Ælfric sees the narrative as a reversal of the fall in the Garden of Eden, the modern interpreters identify the temptation narrative as a haggadic midrash on Deut 8:2-3 and suggest that it engages throughout the story of the Children of Israel after crossing the Red Sea. Luz brings up the notion among his list of possible meanings and chooses to leave all of the possible meanings in play while focusing on the Christological meaning. Boring is content to mention the term, "haggadic tale" but also focuses his exposition elsewhere. Hare utilizes this notion broadly, but Davies and Allison provide the copious detail that support the hypothesis.

Davies and Allison present an intriguing proposition: that Matthew has consciously modeled Jesus and his temptations as an antitype of Israel wandering in the desert after their escape through the Red Sea. The parallels certainly seem plausible and the parallel between Israel, the disobedient son of God, and Jesus, the obedient Son of God, is elegant. Using Deut 8:2–3 as a hermeneutical key makes sense in drawing the key terms together—forty, wilderness, testing, hunger—and it works well as an explanation of the first temptation, when Jesus cites Deut 8:3b. It only works moderately well for the last, however, as there are a range of other OT texts from which the admonition not to worship other gods could come. Finally, it fails to connect at all to the second temptation. Furthermore, if the parallel were to be exact, it is curious that Matthew chooses to have the temptations take place after the forty days fast rather during it—as Mark and Luke have it.

There are some very intriguing parallels that commend the connection of Matthew's temptation narrative with the account of Israel in the wilderness from Deuteronomy, but the comparison fails when we try to insist on a strict point-by-point comparison.⁵⁰³ When taken from a more abstract level, and reading the temptation as Jesus' obedience as opposed to Israel's disobedience, it does make for a compelling parallel.

⁵⁰¹ Luz, Matthew, 1.149-50.

⁵⁰² Boring, "Matthew," 162, 163.

Ælfric's supposition, an ancient one that leads back from Gregory to John Cassian to Leo to Irenaeus Haer. 5.21.2, is also mentioned by some of the modern interpreters. Luz cites it, noting that a number of modern authors (including Bultmann and Tuckett among others) have continued to champion this interpretation, and labels it the parenetic interpretation. ⁵⁰⁴ Without referring to Genesis, Boring mentions an interpretation that foregrounds vice and virtue, labeling it "the ethical interpretation" and damns it with faint praise, warning against a too-quick turn from the text to personal experience in a "quest for relevance." Davies and Allison offer the unusual suggestion that Mark's temptation narrative did indeed proceed from a parallel with the Garden narrative, but that Q rejected that approach in favor of the wandering Children of Israel. ⁵⁰⁶ In an interesting twist, Davies and Allison do return to the notion of Jesus as New Adam during the discussion of the ministering of the angels to Jesus in v. 11, and explore pertinent parallels. ⁵⁰⁷ Hare, however, does not mention this possibility at all.

With Luz, it seems that a both-and approach would be more profitable than a strict either-or. That is, in the temptation narrative, we see Jesus facing the devil in a testing/tempting process that has strong parallels to several texts in the Hebrew Bible including the Fall and the wandering in the desert. Weaker parallels could be drawn to other narratives including David's temptation by his urges towards Bathsheba, and Israel's temptation to a king despite Samuel's remonstration. Both the stronger and weaker parallels pit obedience toward God—God's commands and words—against disobedience. In each

_

⁵⁰³ In particular, Hare's attempt to fit the second temptation with the presence/absence of God comes across a bit strained. (Hare, Matthew, 24-5).

⁵⁰⁴ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 149.

⁵⁰⁵ Boring, "Matthew," 165.

⁵⁰⁶ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.356-7.

⁵⁰⁷ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.374.

case these groups and people, though beloved of the Lord, fail but where they fail, Jesus does not.

However, simply abstracting a meaning of "obedience" misses the greater import that Ælfric's connection makes. Ælfric's typology goes beyond the level of typology. He does not simply argue that Jesus is an antitype of Adam, succeeding where Adam failed. Rather, he presents Jesus' replaying the temptations of Adam as fundamentally redemptive. Adam's narrative is not just a shadow whose meaning is found and fulfilled in Christ, rather, it was for Ælfric a literal event with palpable consequences. Christ's conquest of the devil is not just an idea coming to fruition but is a redemptive act in and of itself on the literal level. For the modern interpreters, typology is a convention that presents Matthew with literary models upon which to construct his narrative of Jesus; in Ælfric's worldview Adam, Eve, Satan, Jesus, and the monks are all equally real people participating in the grand drama of fall and redemption.

The comparison between Ælfric and the modern interpreters is perhaps most fruitful when we examine where they do not connect. The modern interpreters all relate this story back to its immediate context and the preceding pericope—the baptism of Jesus by John and the declaration that Jesus is God's Son. Ælfric, working within a lectionary situation works with the text as a discrete block. Its immediate context for him is not the baptism of Jesus by John but rather Mark's story of walking on the water (Mark 6:47ff)—the Gospel for the Saturday after Quinquagesima—followed by the Gospel for the Monday after Quadragesima, the parable of the Sheep and the Goats (Matt 25:31ff). The modern interpreters, following their contextual clues, all privilege doctrine generally and christology specifically as interpretive categories. Ælfric does not. Of the moderns, Luz remains the most open to a non-doctrinal interpretation; Hare seems the most doctrinal.

The moderns, then, look at the temptations as a series of acts that Jesus is challenged to perform by the Devil. Thus, to determine its meaning, each act is weighed to ascertain what concept or doctrine is being tested and how that fits into a first-century doctrine of the messiah. The foremost question for each temptation, it seems, is whether it is a specifically messianic temptation. This method of focusing on the act has parallels to modernist approaches to ethics that seek to determine morality by analyzing actions and the motivations that lead to them.

Ælfric, on the other hand, does not read the temptations as acts. Rather, he approaches them from a position of monastic pragmatism that asks less about each act than about the virtue or vices that underlie it and what the action reveals about the actor's character. In essence, Ælfric presents a character-ethic reading of the temptation narrative rather than an act-ethic reading.

However, Christology is just as possible in Ælfric's view as the other; there is no reason to separate a "moral" interpretation of the temptation narrative from a "christological" one. To speak about the acts, the morals, the virtues of Jesus is to speak christologically. Ælfric's understanding of redemption is specifically tied to the "morality" or, rather, to the character of who Christ revealed himself to be through the actions described in the gospel narratives. The actions describe a life of perfect humility and therefore perfect virtue; the character of this life is of the utmost important in order to speak of Christ as both a redeemer and as an exemplar because, again, these two categories are inextricably bound.

MATTHEW 5:1–12

Introduction

The beatitudes stand as the great introduction to Matthew's Sermon on the Mount. As the Sermon on the Mount is one of the pre-eminent and most quoted set of dominical teachings, ⁵⁰⁸ the beatitudes occupy a privileged place within the history of Christian thought. Chapter 5 begins with a narrative frame. A disjunctive δε signals a shift from the narrative summary in 4:23-25 to a new set of actions where Jesus gathers his disciples and prepares to speak. At that point, the text moves into a parallel set of eight elements beginning with μακάριοι ὅι and containing a ὅτι clause. A ninth element also begins μακάριοι but then diverges from the pattern and expands upon the eighth element. While a ὅτι clause is present, the expansiveness of this ninth element shows a definite break from the earlier pattern. A shift away from parallelism and a direct address in the second person plural in v. 13 confirms the end of the literary unit.

The heart of the material is Double Tradition, coming from Q 6:20-23, but Matthew has altered and expanded it. Both Eusebius and Aland note the parallels with Luke 6:20b-23 and the liberties that Matthew takes. Eusebius's canons alternate between Double Tradition material and material unique to Matthew. Thus, the first verse is Canon X, verses 2 through 4 are Canon V, Double Tradition Matthew-Luke, v. 5 is Canon X, v. 6 is Canon V, vv. 7-10 are Canon X and vv. 11-12 are Canon V. The only disagreement between Eusebius and Aland concerns v. 4; Eusebius sees a thematic parallel between Matt 5:4 and Luke 6:21b that Aland does not, probably because of the lack of overlap in the Greek text.

It should be noted that the Eusebian divisions reflect an issue in the transmission of the text: Eusebius reverses the order of vv. 4 and 5. Nor is this simply an issue in his text. Within several translation traditions—the Latin, Syrus Curetonianus, and at least one Bohairic Coptic manuscript—verses 4 and 5 are transposed. This transposition also appears in Origen and in the Western Fathers who follow the Latin text, most notably Augustine in his influential commentary on the Sermon on the Mount. The Old English cited by Ælfric follows the transposition found in its Vulgate parent.

⁵⁰⁸ Kissinger, "Sermon on the Mount," 462.

Modern Interpreters

Ulrich Luz

Luz frames the Beatitudes as an interpretive trajectory of the Jesus tradition frozen in a moment. His explication considers their origins, their state as they entered Matthew's hands, their state as they left them, and their reception by the Church through the ages. Rather than focusing on either end of the process, though, he deftly uses both the prehistory and the interpretive history to shed light upon Matthew's text, always returning to the canonical text and focusing on what is found therein.

Luz proposes a three-stage transmission history as the text came to Matthew: a) a the first three beatitudes (Q 6:20b–21a, b=Matt 5:3, 6, 4) may go back to Jesus; b) Q adds a fourth beatitude (Q 6:22–23=Matt 5:11–12); c) in light of Isa 61, the original three beatitudes were reformulated and a new fourth beatitude (Matt 5:5) was added to create a series all beginning with π , and two other beatitudes were also added (Matt 5:7–9). Thus, Matthew received a set of seven beatitudes ,which he then further developed. This separation of layers is essential for Luz as each layer represents a different adaptation of the original. The "unconditional assurance of salvation to people who are in a hopeless situation is decisive" for the first layer that comes from Jesus himself. These authentic beatitudes share "a paradoxical character... the apocalyptic hope for a total reversal of conditions." They are not wholly future, though, because of the person and action of Jesus; their proclamation and

_

⁵⁰⁹ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 187.

⁵¹⁰ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 189.

⁵¹¹ Ibid.

Jesus' action towards the poor and marginalized enact the kingdom as a present event.⁵¹² This layer is fundamentally eschatological.

By the time the text leaves Matthew's hands, this orientation has changed.⁵¹³ Luz contends that Matthew's changes have altered the original meaning by "mov[ing] the sense of the Beatitudes in the direction of paranesis."⁵¹⁴ Matthew's approach is "characterized by an 'ethicizing' tendency; the Beatitudes become a kind of mirror for a Christian life." The original eschatological meaning of the words of Jesus have been transformed and altered.⁵¹⁵

Although Matthew "ethicizes," Luz suggests that the evangelist does not calcify a purely ethical meaning. Rather, he enables the interpretive trajectory of this teaching to continue, assuring its continued survival by opening up the language:

The terms that designate those who are pronounced blessed are very general. They permit the hearers to fill them with their own associations and interpretations. It was precisely the openness of the Matthean formulations that repeatedly makes it possible for the church's interpreters to discover what for them was basic and central in these beatitudes.⁵¹⁶

Thus, the open-ended character of the beatitudes allows each generation to inhabit them anew as shifting theologies find traction in the simple and multivalent words that Matthew uses.

Luz's own interpretation not only pays attention to these later interpretive traditions and chronicles various interpretive approaches, he creatively engages these historical interpretations to gain a better insight into Matthew's own text. Most striking is his use of

-

⁵¹² Ibid.

⁵¹³ Luz is unclear on how Matthew has restructured the material. On one hand he establishes that a seven beatitude tradition has come to him but on the other hand asserts that Matthew's "additions and interpretations" have shifted the meaning of the text (Luz, Matthew 1-7, 190). What these additions and interpretations are in contrast to the pre-Matthean material is not clearly spelled out.

⁵¹⁴ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 190. Emphasis is in the original.

⁵¹⁵ I hesitate to go so far as to say "domesticated." While I think it is clear that Luz prefers these sayings to have an eschatological force, he does not reject their ethical meaning, either. ⁵¹⁶ Ibid.

patristic material. He contends in a minor (typographically identified) excursus that the Reformation exegetes came closer to the original meaning intended by Jesus but in so doing depart from Matthew's: "The Reformation's interpretation has somewhat eliminated the ethicizing and to that degree has come closer to the original meaning (but not to Matthew's meaning!)." While the Reformation finds the eschatological meaning, the early and medieval Church cleaves to Matthew's meaning because of their tendency toward the ethical; their interpretive spin matches and therefore illuminates Matthew's. Luz sides with the early interpreters on the meaning of "righteousness" in v. 6, a key term for him: "In my judgment, without question the decision is to be made in favor of the first, the early church/Catholic interpretation." Furthermore, in asking whether the ethicizing tendency goes too far, Luz looks to the early church to understand how grace plays into Matthew's message and substantively uses the arguments he finds there to absolve the Beatitudes of the fault of works-righteousness.

As far as the actual content of the Beatitudes goes, Luz states that the structure of the passage determines much of its meaning; the inclusio formed by the appearance of kingdom of heaven in v. 3 and 10 sets the agenda for the other beatitudes: "With this first promise Matthew sets brackets around all the Beatitudes (vv. 3, 10); the remaining concluding clauses develop what 'kingdom of heaven' means." Not only does kingdom of heaven appear in strategic locations—so does righteousness. Matthew introduces his "key concept" in the middle and at the end of the sequence. This concept further grounds how the Matthean beatitudes should be understood. Luz understands Matthew's righteousness as:

...a human attitude or conduct. One can be persecuted only because of that conduct, not because one merely longs for (divine) righteousness. Righteousness is characterized by

.

⁵¹⁷ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 200.

⁵¹⁸ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 195.

⁵¹⁹ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 199-202.

⁵²⁰ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 193.

⁵²¹ Luz, Matthew 1-7, 195.

Christian practice and confessing Jesus. ... Confessing Christ manifests itself in deeds (7:21–23; 25:31–46). ⁵²²

Thus, Luz reads the Beatitudes as enjoining a set of actions that jointly constitute righteousness and set the agenda of the kingdom of heaven.

Davies and Allison

While Davies and Allison begin with looking at the structure of the Beatitudes (where they decided they are formed from three triplets, given the Matthean love of threes), their argument proper begins in an excursus on beatitudes. In this excursus, they distinguish between two fundamental forms of beatitudes: wisdom and eschatological. No absolute method of discerning the difference between the two is offered but certain characteristics identify the eschatological form. The most fundamental is the literary function:

The eschatological makarism, it is important to observe, is usually addressed to people in dire straits, and the promise to them is of future consolation. So in contrast to the wisdom beatitude where moral exhortation is, despite the declarative form, generally the object, assurance and the proffering of hope are the goal: eyes become focused on the future, which will reverse natural values and the present situation; fulfillment is no longer to be found in this world but in a new world. The dismal status quo of those addressed is taken as a given for the present and is only to be altered by the eschatological intervention of God. ⁵²³

Thus, the eschatological beatitude is about a "future consolation" while the wisdom beatitude is about "moral exhortation." Additionally, the eschatological beatitude is found in series as well as pairs while the moral is only found in pairs, and the eschatological blessing is sometimes paired with an eschatological woe. 525 They note that both kinds of 523 Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.432.

⁵²² Luz, Matthew 1-7, 199.

⁵²⁴ Ibid

⁵²⁵ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.433.

blessings are found within the NT writings and that the Beatitudes are quite typical—only their brevity is exceptional, particularly in their Lukan form. ⁵²⁶

Drawing their observations about structure and beatitudes together, Davies and Allison posit four stages of development for the Matthean beatitudes; the key is that the first stage, coming from Jesus, consists of three eschatological beatitudes (blessed are the poor, blessed are those who mourn, and blessed are those who hunger). The rest of the beatitudes and their later form came at the hands of Q compilers and evangelists. An eschatological quality therefore grounds the series—the precise nature of the Matthean beatitudes is open for question, especially by modern scholars. Davies and Allison present the question with a section entitled "Entrance requirements or eschatological blessings?" While confirming the "initial plausibility" of the first and majority position and granting it "an element of truth," eight points challenge this view and the conclusion disavows it:

In conclusion, it would be foolish to deny the imperatives implicit in 5.3–12: there is no going around this. (This is also true of the woes in Mt 23, which, although not primarily exhortation, offer such implicitly, even to Matthew's Christian readers.) But the question is whether the primary function of the Matthean beatitudes is moral, and whether a moral dimension excludes a promissory or conciliatory dimension. The answer in both cases is negative. 5.3–12 serves firstly to bless the faithful as they are now. When Jesus speaks, the drudgery and the difficulties of day-to-day life fade away and the bliss of the life to come proleptically appears. Time is, however briefly, overcome, and the saints are refreshed.

Thus, Davies and Allison offer an answer that privileges the eschatological but, upon reflection, is a veiled acceptance of the moral as well. The negative affirmation denies a ⁵²⁶ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.434.

⁵²⁷ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.435.

⁵²⁸ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.439.

⁵²⁹ Ibid.

solely moral meaning and, while straining towards the eschatological, reluctantly acknowledges the presence of the moral.

The exegesis of the beatitudes themselves follows this pattern: eschatological qualities are privileged. Moral meanings are not denied, but are not at the forefront either. Thus the addition of "in spirit" to the first beatitude does make a religious turn towards a quality that can be cultivated, but does not negate the economic meaning of "the poor" as "the two go together." In taking up 5:4 they note "It is difficult to see how [this verse] can be understood as paranesis." Possessing the earth in 5:5 is "an eschatological promise" 532

However, while Davies and Allison point out the eschatological character of the verses, they do not impose eschatology as a rigid framework nor seek to discover it where there are no warrants. Thus 5:6 is a "recognizable behavior" that must be earnestly and habitually sought." A moral meaning and presence is neither denied nor denigrated—but neither is it actively advocated.

Five concluding observations round out their treatment of the beatitudes. In the first, Davies and Allison note that these makarisms are "blessings, not requirements." Like the healings at the end of Matt 4, these are the breath of grace before the hard words of Matt 5—7. The second point continues this theme:

According to Mt. 5:3–12, the kingdom of God will bring eschatological comfort, a permanent inheritance, true satisfaction, the obtaining of mercy, the vision of God, and divine sonship. In brief, it will in every way bring the telos of the religious quest. Thus the word "kingdom" serves to foretell the eventual realization in human experience of the ⁵³⁰ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.443.

⁵³¹ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.449.

⁵³² Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.450.

⁵³³ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.453.

⁵³⁴ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.452.

⁵³⁵ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.466.

fullness of God's bounteous presence. "Kingdom" is indeed almost a surrogate for God, and it is rightly considered the summum bonum of Matthew's gospel.⁵³⁶

The third point is Christological in that the beatitudes—particularly their earlier layers that may well go back to Jesus—are based upon Isa 61.1–3. Thus, in his blessing of the poor and mourning in these beatitudes, Jesus is functioning in his messianic role. And yet—point 4 notes that Jesus himself fulfills the very categories he blesses: meek, mourning, righteous, merciful, persecuted and reproached. "So the beatitudes are illustrated and brought to life by Jesus' actions. He embodies his own words and thereby becomes the standard or model to be imitated (cf. Origen in PG 13.152)."⁵³⁷ The fifth and final point returns again to eschatology. The beatitudes function as a "practical theodicy"⁵³⁸ that seeks not to explain the mysteries of why some are poor and mourn but put present circumstances into perspective through the appeal to eschatological consolation.

Douglas Hare

Hare does not treat the Beatitudes as a discrete pericope, but includes them in a section that covers the whole Sermon on the Mount, stretching from 5:1–7:29. A brief introduction sets up the sermon as a whole, then dives into the text. As a result, Hare's treatment lacks many of the technical considerations specific to the Beatitudes of the other treatments, notably questions of tradition history. Indeed he is concerned more with an overall impression than with a detailed analysis.

Hare's quick treatment of the initial setting in vv. 1–2 is fairly cursory and suggestive. While he states that Matthew is connecting Jesus with Moses in the use of mountain imagery for his central teaching, he remains insistent that Matthew does not push the Moses typology because Jesus is greater than Moses. Rather: "he apparently wishes his readers to see the

537 Davies and Allison, Matthew, 1.467.

⁵³⁶ Ihid

⁵³⁸ Ibid.

Sermon on the Mount as a definitive interpretation of Torah delivered to Moses on Mount Sinai."⁵³⁹ He suggests that the key Old Testament character and mountain that should be in the reader's mind is less Moses and Sinai but David and Zion, highlighting what he finds to be kingly imagery:

[Jesus] sits like a king on his throne, his disciples approach him like subjects in a royal court, and the king delivers his inaugural address, in which he lays out in considerable detail what life in his kingdom will be like.⁵⁴⁰

Because of the emphasis on interpretation rather than a new law, fulfillment rather than dissolution, and what Hare understands as court ceremonial, the initial setting of the sermon is more a christological statement than anything else.

Hare then approaches the Beatitudes (5:3–12), beginning with a brief introduction before proceeding to the text. He notes first the scholarly argument as to whether the Beatitudes are "eschatological warnings or entrance requirements"⁵⁴¹ and takes the irresolvable nature of the debate to signal that they are both "expressions of eschatological grace and implicit commands."⁵⁴² As the commentary will reveal, however, he tends towards the eschatological over the ethical. A short introduction to makarisms orients the reader to the main issues, pointing to Ps 1:1 as the makarism closest in nature to Matthew's. Hare makes no summary statements concerning the beatitudes but moves directly into the remainder of Matthew's sermon.

Hare approaches the Beatitudes with Scripture firmly in hand, relying upon intertexuality to clarify their meaning almost to the point of embracing a canonical criticism model. That is, his approach to the Beatitudes is to find a related text or text, preferably from the Old Testament, to clarify the meaning of the passage. A comment in his

540 Hare, Matthew, 35.

⁵³⁹ Hare, Matthew, 34.

⁵⁴¹ Ibid. The emphasis is in the original.

⁵⁴² Ibid.

interpretation of v. 4 presents his agenda: "Here as elsewhere in Jesus' teachings the key to interpretation lies in the Hebrew Scriptures" and also in the remarks on v. 7: "Again we must regard the Old Testament background as constitutive of a correct understanding." Deutero-Isaiah and the Psalms in particular are identified often as the source of these statements.

This having been said, Hare's most important dialogue partner is not actually from the Old Testament but is Luke's gospel. Perhaps because of his attention to the Lukan parallels, Hare tends to depart from Matthew's text, preferring the "revolutionary rhetoric" of Jesus which he finds more clearly presented in Luke's versions. Following this path, Hare tends towards economic interpretations of the Beatitudes, preferring whenever possible to turn the text and its meaning back to "the world of economic struggle." Thus the "mourning" of v. 4 is not an internalized mourning for sins, but rather—reading through Isa 61—mourning for the desolation of the land of Israel and the economic injustices rampant in the land; the "meek" in v. 5 read through Ps 37 are the tenant farmers who will receive land of their own rather than working the lands of others. Even the peacemakers of v. 9 are those who seek to restore God's shalom defined as "harmonious cooperation aimed at the welfare of all, [that] could not be established by the Roman legions." The Beatitudes read this way, then, are presented as primarily eschatological warnings that presage the reversal of the current economic and imperialistic system retaining a subdued ethical note on behalf of social justice.

⁵⁴³ Hare, Matthew, 37.

⁵⁴⁴ Hare, Matthew, 40.

⁵⁴⁵ Hare, Matthew, 37.

⁵⁴⁶ Ibid.

⁵⁴⁷ Hare, Matthew, 37-38.

⁵⁴⁸ Hare, Matthew, 38-39.

⁵⁴⁹ Hare, Matthew, 42.

Eugene Boring

Boring's interpretation of the Beatitudes can only be described as relentlessly eschatological. As a hermeneutic, eschatology is dominant and at times seems to dominate the text itself. Boring begins his exegesis of the Beatitudes with a section that lays out the nature of Matthean makarisms, then produces seven hermeneutical corollaries that flow from this definition. His introductory framework carries through his verse-by-verse treatment. In particular, the seven corollaries lay out the importance of eschatology, which the exegetical section then implements.

The emphasis on eschatology begins with Boring's presentation of makarisms as a form. He asserts:

The Matthean beatitudes were originally a wisdom form filled by early Christianity with prophetic eschatological content. Matthew's beatitudes are not practical advice for successful living, but prophetic declarations made on the conviction of the coming-and-already-present kingdom of God.⁵⁵⁰

This definition presents two strong themes that will carry throughout the interpretation: 1) the Beatitudes are fundamentally eschatological, and 2) they are not about ethics or virtues. The successive corollaries and exegetical remarks clarify this.

The eschatological orientation is clear from the literary form of the text, from the verb tense utilized, and from their very nature. Making a distinction between paranetic wisdom beatitudes and eschatological prophetic beatitudes, Boring strongly asserts the prophetic eschatological nature of Matthew's Beatitudes. He does not spend much time demonstrating this assertion but makes an observation based on form: wisdom beatitudes "declare present happiness and reward" while "[i]n the Prophets, makarisms declare the present/future blessedness of those who are presently in dire circumstances but who will be vindicated at the eschatological coming of God's kingdom."552 He goes on to note: "In the New Testament outside the Synoptics, most beatitudes are found in the prophetic book of Revelation."553 As far as Boring is concerned, then, New Testament beatitudes are most likely if not necessarily eschatological in nature.

_

⁵⁵⁰ Boring, "Matthew," 177.

⁵⁵¹ Ibid.

As Boring proceeds through the text he notes a number of times the presence of the future passive tense in the second half of various beatitudes. He dissuades readers from seeing these as future rewards for specific behaviors but identifies them as the "eschatological divine passive." The verbs in the second halves of vv. 4, 6, 7, and 9 in particular are identified as utilizing this grammatical construction.

Furthermore, Boring flatly asserts the eschatological nature of the Beatitudes in his corollary 6: "The beatitudes are not historical but eschatological." 555 The Beatitudes' structural bracket also feeds into the eschatological interpretation: "The first and last of the formally identical series 5:3-10 refer directly to the coming kingdom, and all the others express some eschatological aspect of it."556 In the body of corollary 6, Boring interprets the verbal phrases in the second halves of vv. 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9 to clarify their eschatological meaning and that therefore all of these blessings "are not this-worldly practical realities, but elements of the eschatological hopes of Israel."557 By the time that the reader gets to the interpretation proper, then, its eschatological character has been predetermined.

Corollary 3, though, is Boring's acknowledgement of the moral dimension of the beatitudes. In this brief corollary he note that: "there is, however, an ethical dimension to the beatitudes."558 However, the ethical is aligned with the eschatological: proper ethics are

⁵⁵² Ibid.

⁵⁵³ Ibid.

⁵⁵⁴ Boring, "Matthew," 179.

⁵⁵⁵ Boring, "Matthew," 178.

⁵⁵⁶ Ibid.

⁵⁵⁷ Ibid.

⁵⁵⁸ Boring, "Matthew," 177.

defined as "act[ing] in accord with the coming kingdom" and Boring notes that the life of the blessed is elaborated later in the sermon in 5:17–7:12. ⁵⁵⁹

A more direct challenge to views of the Beatitudes as either entrance requirements or a code of ethics comes through Boring's appeal to the communitarian nature of the text. He begins by stating in corollary 2 that: "they do not directly lay down demands for conversion, but declare the notae ecclesiae, the 'marks of the church." His strongest statement on the matter is in corollary 7:

The nine pronouncements are thus not statements about general human virtues—most appear exactly the opposite to common wisdom. Rather, they pronounce blessing on authentic disciples in the Christian community. All of the beatitudes apply to one group of people, the real Christians of Matthew's community. They do not describe nine different kinds of good people who get to go to heaven, but are nine declarations about the blessedness, contrary to all appearances, of the eschatological community living in anticipation of God's reign. Like all else in Matthew, they are oriented to life together in the community of discipleship, not to individualistic ethics. ⁵⁶¹

Here Boring cuts to heart of his opposition to an ethical or ethicizing interpretation of the Beatitudes. For him, the turn to the ethical is also the turn to the individual and the interior. Rather, he states, these are the marks of a community as a whole with various elements embodied at various times by various members.

Finally, Boring also speaks of an implicit christology in the Beatitudes that pervades all of the Sermon on the Mount. Two of his convictions provide a sense of how this implicit christology is at work. In Corollary 4, Boring states that the Beatitudes are fundamentally performative:

-

⁵⁵⁹ Ibid.

⁵⁶⁰ Ibid.

⁵⁶¹ Boring, "Matthew," 178.

The beatitudes are written in unconditional performative language. They do not merely describe something that already is, but bring into being the reality they declare. The form is not "if you will x, then y" or "whoever x, then y," but unconditionally declare that those who are x will be y. Like the patriarchal and priestly blessings, and like the prophetic word of the Scripture, the beatitude effects what it says, bringing into being what it states.⁵⁶²

Boring does not explicitly tease out the implications that necessarily follow from this set of statements. If the Beatitudes are both highly eschatological and performative than it must follow that the Christology reveals Jesus as the eschatological power person par excellence. He does, however, develop the implicit Christology in the next corollary:

Understood as a prophetic pronouncement, the truth claim of the beatitude is not independently true but dependent on the speaker. ... In the narrative context of the Sermon on the Mount, the speaker is more than a prophet, he is the Son of God and the Lord of the church, already seen from the post-Easter perspective. The beatitudes, therefore, are not observations about reality that others of lesser insight had simply overlooked, such as truths of mathematics or logic. They are true on the basis of the authority of the one who speaks. Thus for Matthew Jesus' beatitudes are related to the theme of authority (ἐξουσία exonsia) of Jesus (see 7:29; 8:9; 9:6; 21:23; 28:18). In the first words of the Sermon on the Mount, we do not meet general statements, the truth of which we can investigate on our own terms, with our own criteria, but a veiled, implicit, christological claim that calls for taking a stand with regard to the speaker, not merely the content of his speech. 563

Thus, the Christology that Boring finds is not simply that of a wise ethical teacher, rather he discovers a teacher—yes—but more than that, a being of eschatological power whose very word shifts the nature of reality.

_

⁵⁶² Boring, "Matthew," 177.

⁵⁶³ Ibid.

While Boring's interpretation tends to extremes with his relentless pursuit of the eschatological, he does so to provide what he understands as a necessary counter-balance to flatly ethical readings that have pervaded the church for centuries. Boring's point is not to repudiate ethics altogether but to present an interpretation that does not give in to either ethicizing or internalizing tendencies. In response, he highlights the eschatological and communal aspects of the Beatitudes to present a better rounded understanding of this central text.

Ælfric's Interpretation

The Homily Proper

Ælfric's sermon for the Feast of All Saints⁵⁶⁴ is a bipartite treatment of the Epistle and Gospel appointed for the occasion. He engages both texts through the lens of the

- I. Treatment of the Epistle (ll. 3-146)
 - A. Introduction (ll. 3-7)
 - B. Translation of the Epistle (ll. 7-15)
 - C. Classifying the Saints and Angels (ll. 16-136)
 - 1. The Angels (ll. 16-35)
 - 2. The Patriarchs (ll. 35-41)
 - 3. The Prophets (ll. 41-51)
 - 4. John the Baptist (ll. 52-55)
 - 5. The Apostles (ll. 55-70)
 - 6. The Martyrs (ll. 71-88)
 - 7. The Priests/Confessors (ll. 89-103)
 - 8. The Hermits (ll. 104-117)
 - 9. The Blessed Virgin Mary (ll. 118-129)
 - 10. Virgins (ll. 130-136)
 - D. Conclusion/Transition (ll. 137-146)
- II. Treatment of the Gospel (ll. 147-291)
 - A. Introduction (ll. 147-152)
 - B. Translation of the Gospel (ll. 152-166)
 - C. Exposition of the Gospel (ll. 167-281)
 - 1. Narrative Frame (ll. 167-179)
 - 2. 1st Beatitude (ll. 180-197)
 - 3. 2nd Beatitude (ll. 198-204)
 - 4. 3rd Beatitude (ll. 205-210)
 - 5. 4th Beatitude (ll. 211-218)
 - 6. 5th Beatitude (ll. 219-221)
 - 7. 6th Beatitude (ll. 222-227)
 - 8. 7th Beatitude (ll. 227-235)
 - 9. 8th Beatitude (ll. 236-279)
 - D. Conclusion (ll. 280-291)

liturgical event, shaping his exposition of the texts specifically for the occasion. This homily is an orderly one, logically constructed and amenable to a structural analysis (see figure 1). In each half of the homily, Ælfric presents the text in English translation after a brief introduction, then explicates the text.

After presenting the appointed epistle, Rev 7:9–12, Ælfric systematically describes the various categories and classes of angels and saints whom the faithful venerate on this day. He is prompted by the question immediately following this pericope from Rev 7:13; the elder asks the visionary St John, "Who are these dressed in white robes and from whence have they come?" Just as the elder answers the question, so too does Ælfric.

⁵⁶⁴ The Feast of All Saints is celebrated on November 1st following the date of Gregory III's consecration of a chapel in St Peter's to All Saints on that date. Given the large number of saints already venerated by the early medieval church—with more being added almost daily—this festival was an opportunity to properly propitiate all of the saints, even those unknown or forgotten, so that no heavenly intercessors would be overlooked. Among other things, it represents a movement on the part of a heavily monastic clergy to allow the laity to share in the veneration of the saints while recognizing the impracticality of lay attendance at Sanctoral masses and offices.

⁵⁶⁵ hii qui amicti sunt stolis albis qui sunt et unde venerunt

In his response, Ælfric utilizes categories drawn from his periodization of history familiar from the eschatological epic. ⁵⁶⁶ After briefly mentioning angels and highlighting the dangers of focusing too much on things unknown, Ælfric begins with the biblical saints—patriarchs, prophets, John the Baptist, and the apostles. He moves naturally to post-biblical times and discusses the martyrs; then, alluding to the cessation of official persecution of Christians, ⁵⁶⁷ to priests/confessors. At this point Ælfric seems to continue his chronological scheme, moving to hermits and the anchorites of the Egyptian desert. ⁵⁶⁸ A sudden shift to a vocative address of the Blessed Virgin breaks the chronological schema. After an encomium highlighting the virginity of Mary, Ælfric moves to his final category—the virgins and widows. A concluding paragraph returns the focus to the liturgical celebration, reminding the congregation that they are here to honor and venerate these saints and angels, trusting in the strength of their intercession.

While a great number of holy beings are explicated, this half of the homily focuses the most attention upon the holy state of martyrdom. While Ælfric heaps praise upon all of the holy beings—both angels and humans—the most effusive praise and the most certain picture of glory goes to those who died for their faith:

After the "army of the apostles" we honor the triumphant host of God's martyrs⁵⁶⁹ who through great tortures manfully conformed to the suffering of Christ and through their martyrdom entered the heavenly kingdom. Some were slain with weapons, some consumed by fire. Others were beaten with scourges, others through with stakes. Some hung on

⁵⁶⁶ See the discussion of Æflric's conception and construction of the span of history as an eschatological epic in chapter 2.

_

⁵⁶⁷Æfter ablunnenre ehtnysse reþra cyninga & ealdormanna on siblicere drohtnunge godes gelaþunge wær on halige sacer das gode þeonde; [After the cessation of the cruel persecutions of kings and governors, holy priests of God prospered under a peaceful condition for God's church.] (ll. 89-91).

⁵⁶⁸ While the previous transition is clearly temporal, Ælfric's thinking is not as clear here. He begins with an ambiguous "Dysum fyligð [After these followed....]" (ll. 104). The notion of following could be temporal in a chronological sense or metaphorical in a categorical sense; Ælfric gives no clear signals but the context urges for a temporal reading.

⁵⁶⁹ The OE "heap godes cybera" appears to be a direct reference to the "Martyrum ... exercitus (army of the martyrs)" from the Te Deum.

crosses, some sank in the wide sea. Others were flayed alive, others torn with iron claws. Some were overwhelmed with stones, some afflicted with winter's cold, some tormented with hunger. The hands and feet of some were, on account of their faith and the holy name of Christ the Savior, cut off as a spectacle for the crowds. These are the triumphant friends of God for whom the wicked governors had contempt but now they are crowned with the victory of their sufferings in eternal joy. They may have been killed bodily but they would not turn from God despite any torture. Their hope was fulfilled in immortality though they were tortured before men. They were afflicted for a short time but cheered for a long time because their God tested them just as gold in an oven and he found them worthy and, just as a holy offering, he received them into his heavenly kingdom.⁵⁷⁰

The martyrs, then become the "gold standard" for sanctity. The post-Constantinian period became problematic because of a lack of active persecution. As a result, Ælfric explains how the confessors could attain to sanctity through following the path of spiritual martyrdom even if they do not achieve it physically. That is, even though they do not receive martyrdom, their achievements are weighed in relation to it:

...though [the confessors] did not experience the persecution of the sword yet through the merit of their lives they were not deprived of martyrdom because martyrdom is

⁵⁷⁰ Ll. 71-88. Æfter þam apostolican werode we wurþiað þone sigefæstan heap godes cyþera þe þurh mislicum tintregum cristes þrowunge werlice geefenlæhton & þurh martyrdome þæt upplice rice geferdon; Sume hi wæron mid wæpnum ofslegene: sume on lige forswælede; Oþre mid swipum ofbeatene oþre mid stengum þurhðyde; Sume on hengene gecwylmede sume on widdre sæ besencte; Oþre cuce behylde oþre mid isenum clawum totorene; Sume mid stanum ofhrorene sume mid winterlicum cyle geswencte sume mid hungre gecwylmede; Sume handum & fotum forcorfene folce to wæfersyne for geleafan & halgum naman hælendes cristes; Da sind þa sigefæstan godes frynd þe ðæra forscyldgodra ealdormanna hæse forsawon & nu hi sind gewuldorbeagode mid sige heora þrowunga on ecere myrhþe; Hi mihton beon lichamlice acwealde ac hi ne mihton fram gode þurh nanum tintregum beon gebigede; Heora hiht wæs mid undeadlicnysse afylled þeah þe hi ætforan mannum getintregode wæron; Hi wæron scortlice gedrehte & langlice gefrefrode for þan þe god heora afandode swa swa gold on ofene & he afunde hi him wyrþe & swa swa halig offrung he hi underfeng to his heofenlicum rice;

accomplished not in blood alone but also in abstinence from sins and in the application of God's commands.⁵⁷¹

The message is that sainthood comes through the persecution and endurance of martyrdom—even if there are not accommodating heathen rulers about, it may be simulated through asceticism and obedience to God in the face of diabolic temptations.⁵⁷²

Ælfric then turns to the Gospel reading for the day, Matt 5:1–12. He introduces it with a segue from the section on the categories of saints by explaining that this gospel tells how the faithful become saints.⁵⁷³ A translation of the Gospel into English follows. Ælfric begins his treatment by explaining that he presents Augustine's teaching and dives into an explanation. The events within the narrative frame preceding the beatitudes are interpreted as enigmas with doctrinal solutions: the height of the mountain contrasts the height of Jesus' teachings above that of Moses; sitting as a teacher, Jesus called the disciples spiritually to himself as well as physically; the one who opened his mouth was also the one who opened the mouths of the prophets.

The beatitudes are taken in turn. Ælfric gives predominantly moral interpretations of the Beatitudes. That is, each of the predicate nominatives placed apposite to the blessings is interpreted as a manifestation of a concrete virtue. The second half of each line presents a reward granted to those who enact the named virtue. Both the predicate nominatives and the contents of the subordinant clause are treated as enigmas; Ælfric's practice is to present the plain meaning, identifying the virtues inherent in each and its proper reward. Following standard patristic practice, Ælfric's interpretations often contain a passage of scripture that back the selected solution to the enigma. The first seven blessings are treated in a spare fifty-six lines (ll. 180-235)—an average of six lines per blessing.⁵⁷⁴

⁵⁷¹ Ll. 99-103. & þeah ðe hi swurdes ehtnysse ne gefreddon þeah þurh heora lifes geearnungum hi ne beoð martyrdomes bedælede: for þan ðe martyrdom bið gefremmed na on blodes gyte anum ac eac swilce on synna forhæfednysse & on bigencge godes beboda;

⁵⁷² See the discussion in the 7th-8th century Irish Cambrai Homily of the ascetical "white" and "blue" martyrdoms contrasted with literal "red" martyrdom. Ælfric makes no references to such a color scheme here or elsewhere

⁵⁷³ Dæt halige godspel þe nu lytle ær ætforan eow geræd wæs micclum geþwærlæcð þissere freolstide for þan ðe hit geendebyrd þa eahta eadignyssa þe þa halgan to heofenlicum geþingbum gebrohton [That holy gospel which now just a little bit before was read to you is greatly harmonious with this feast-day because it orderly arranges the eight blessings which brought the saints to heavenly intercession.] (ll. 149-51).

The first and sixth beatitudes represent Ælfric's treatment of this text. The first receives the longest treatment of any of the first seven beatitudes—18 lines (ll. 180-97). The treatment begins with the citation of the beatitude itself (ll. 180-1). Then, the term "gastlican bearfan [spiritually poor]" is specifically defined: "What are the spiritually poor except the humble who have the fear of God and do not have any arrogance" (ll. 181-2). This interpretation returns to the interpretation of the "mountain" in ll. 167-73 where the height signifies the lofty commands leading to the filial fear of God as opposed to the old law rooted in servile fear. From this definition, the two key concepts—the fear of God and arrogance—are then clarified by means of two scriptural warrants: "The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom' [Ps 110:11; Prov 1:7; 9:10; Sir 1:12] and 'pride is likewise the beginning of sin' [Sir 10:15]" (ll. 182-3). Once the words are defined, Ælfric moves to clarify the concepts represented by the text.

The conceptual explanation draws distinctions through two dichotomies of poverty proceeding from the definitions: a material dichotomy between the rich and poor and a spiritual dichotomy between the humble and the proud. The four possible combinations are described through the use of paradigms. Ælfric begins with the materially poor-but-spiritually proud; the paradigm operates at the general level of the categorical (encompassing all poor but proud people) and is for the sake of restraint. Their poverty is not commendable because while they are materially poor they wish for wealth. The materially wealthy-but-spiritually humble are commended and Abraham, Jacob, and David are identified as individual examples for encouragement and emulation. The third category, the materially ⁵⁷⁴ The first beatitude receives 18 lines (ll. 180-97); the second, 7 (ll. 198-204); the third, 6 (ll. 205-10); the fourth, 8 (ll. 211-8); the fifth, 3 (ll. 219-21); the sixth, 5 (ll. 222-6); and the seventh, 9 (ll. 227-35).

⁵⁷⁵ Hwæt sind þa gastlican þear fan buton þa eadmodan þe godes ege habbað & nane toþundennysse nabbað; Ll. 181-2.

⁵⁷⁶ Godes ege is wisdomes anginn: & modignys is ælcer e synne angin; Ll. 182-183 wealthy-and-spiritually proud—made explicit as "de modigan rican [the proud rich]" (l. 190)—are also are kept at the categorical level of generality and are presented as a negative example. The final category is that which most completely matches the Gospel teaching in Ælfric's eyes and is therefore most worthy of emulation: the materially poor-and-spiritually humble. Here too the paradigm used is more specific than the category itself; the group selected for emulation are monks. Ælfric explains that for their poverty in both wealth and spirit, monks will receive great glory afterward. At this point, however, the exposition of the first beatitude ends without an explication of the kingdom of God—the reward of the spiritually poor.

The sixth beatitude is an example of Ælfric's more typical brief treatment of the beatitudes. Spanning only seven lines (ll. 222-7) made up of two sentences, Ælfric begins by citing the beatitude (l. 222), then denies a potential literal reading of the passage: "They are foolish who wish to see God with a fleshly eye for he will be seen with the heart…" (ll. 222-4). ⁵⁷⁷ In essence, he has identified the passage as a metaphor where the action of the eye has been transferred to the heart (which is itself a metaphor for the seat of virtue within a human). He finishes the sentence by restating the beatitude in such a way as to define clean-heartedness: "…but they who are clean from vice are those who may see God" (ll. 224-5). ⁵⁷⁸ The concluding sentence is an example drawn from the world of science: "Just as earthly light may not be seen except with a clean eye so also God will not be seen except with a clean heart." ⁵⁷⁹ With this statement, Ælfric moves on to the next beatitude.

The eighth beatitude receives almost the same amount of material as all of the other beatitudes put together—forty-four lines (ll. 236-279). This emphasis is quite deliberate; for Ælfric, persecution is the surest sign of fidelity to Christ in both words and works.

⁵⁷⁷ Stunte sind þa ðe gewilniað god to geseonne mid flæsclicum eagum: þonne he bið mid þære heortan gesewen:

⁵⁷⁸ ac heo is to clænsienne fram leahtrum þæt heo god geseon mage;

⁵⁷⁹ Swa swa eor ðlic leoht ne mæg beon gesewen buton mid clænum eagum: swa eac ne bið god gesewen buton mid clænre heortan;

Explicating the beatitude through a thick tapestry of Scripture references, he brings in the climax from tribulation to hope from Rom 5:3–5, then moves to explicit citations from James 1:2–3⁵⁸⁰ and Sirach 27:6 pointing to the necessity of testing and concludes with John 15:18, 20:

It is fitting that the faithful glory in tribulation because tribulation brings forth patience and patience, endurance, and endurance hope. This hope is truly never confounded because the love of God is poured into our hearts through the Holy Ghost through whom we are forgiven. The apostle James spoke concerning this: "Ho, my brothers, endure in all joy when you are in various sufferings because the endurance of your faith is more precious than gold which has been tried⁵⁸¹ by fire." Also the holy writings say: "Earthen vessels are tested in the oven and righteous men in the tribulation of their suffering." Furthermore, the Savior spoke about this to his disciples in another place: "If the earth hates you, know that it hated me before you, and if they persecuted me, then they will also persecute you."⁵⁸²

In this way, Ælfric suggests that true Christianity can be measured—if his hearers are under attack whether physically or spiritually, then they are doing something right. Suffering is a true sign of righteous action whether these persecutions be from the visible or invisible forces of Satan.

-

⁵⁸⁰ His citation here is more a loose paraphrase of James 1:2–3 as filtered through Haymo than a formal quotation. Godden, Commentary, 307.

⁵⁸¹ The terms "endurance," "tried" and "tested" in this passage are all forms of the OE root afandian (highlighted below for easy reference). Modern English does not have a comparable word that covers the range of meanings that this single OE word captures, thus the logic of the passage which follows the different uses of the term is obscured by my translation.

⁵⁸² Ll. 262-274. Geleaffullum gedafenað þæt hi wuldrian on gedrefednyssum for þan seo gedrefednys wyrhð geþyld & þæt geþyld afandunge & seo afandung hiht; Se hiht soþlice ne bið næfre gescynd for þan ðe godes lufu is agoten on urum heortum þurh ðone halgan gast se þe us is forgyfen; Be þysum cwæð se apostol iacobus; Eala ge mine gebroþru: wenað eow ælcere blisse þonne ge beoð on mislicum costnungum: for þan ðe seo afandung eoweres geleafan is micele deorwurþre þonne gold þe bið ðurh fyre afandod; Eft cwyð ðæt halige gewrit læmene fatu beoð on ofne afandode: & rihtwise men on gedrefednysse heora costnunge; Be þisum cwæð eac se hælend on oðre stowe to his leorningcnihtum; Gif þes middaneard eow hatað wite ge þæt he me hatode ær eow & gif hi min ehton þonne ehtað hi eac eower;

In his concluding statement on this beatitude, Ælfric makes the crucial link between the two halves of his homily—a link quite natural to him but not immediately apparent to modern readers.:

Christ himself was killed by lawless men—and so too were his disciples and the martyrs. All those who wish to conduct themselves virtuously within the faithful church shall endure persecution either from invisible devils or from the visible lawless "limbs of the devil." However, we should endure these temporary persecutions or tribulations for the name of Christ with joy because he thus commanded all patience: "Rejoice and exult because your reward is manifold in heaven." 584

The beatitude spoken here by Christ was enacted by Christ on the cross. Those who followed most closely in his footsteps were joined to him in a fate like his: the disciples all of whom died for their faith (with the sole exception of John) and the martyrs who followed them. Returning to the section on the martyrs (cited in full above), the same words and concepts are utilized: persecution, endurance, death, and the comparison of the righteous with gold tried in the fire. The persecution beatitude is fulfilled most perfectly by the martyrs and those who follow in their footsteps.

A brief conclusion states that much remains unsaid concerning this text. Ælfric then moves towards the traditional Trinitarian doxology by praising God for the abundance of his saints. He touches on major points of the theology of the saints—their intercession on our behalf, our rejoicing with them, and the veneration due them—while remaining in a doxological mode leading to the final Trinitarian ending.

This is a well-known trope drawn from the seventh interpretive rule of the Donatist Tychonius, handed on to the orthodox church by Augustine in Book 3 of De Doctrina Christiana (De. Doc. Chr. III.37.55.). Just as the church is the visible limbs of the body of Christ, so in parallel evil men are considered the limbs of the devil.

church is the visible limbs of the body of Christ, so in parallel evil men are considered the limbs of the devil. 584 Ll. 274-281. Crist sylf wæs fram arleasum mannum acweald & swa eac his leorningcnihtas & martyras & ealle ða ðe gewilniað arfæstlice to drohtnigenne on geleaffulre gelaðunge hi sceolon ehtnysse þolian oððe fram ungesewenlicum deofle oððe fram gesewenlicum arleasum deofles leomum: ac þas hwilwendlican ehtnyssa oððe gedrefednyssa we sceolon mid gefean for cristes naman geþafian for þan ðe he þus behet eallum geþyldigum: blissiað & fægniað: efne eower med is menigfeald on heofonum;

The Liturgical Context

Although the Feast of All Saints appears late in Western lectionaries, ⁵⁸⁵ Matt 5:1–12 was first connected with feasts of multiple martyrs. ⁵⁸⁶ Ælfric's emphasis on the eighth beatitude readily locates the interpretive center of gravity for this text within the early medieval period; while all saints are in view throughout the Ælfric's work, special emphasis is placed throughout upon martyrs and the blessedness accorded to the state of martyrdom. The last beatitude which focuses upon persecution sets the tone for the homily as a whole.

Ælfric's work is guided once again by the liturgical suggestions given in Paul the Deacon's homiliary. In fact, referring to Paul's homiliary as received by Ælfric gives us important insight into both Ælfric's compositional technique and the context for which he intended his sermons. As the Feast of All Saints was not widely celebrated until after the compilation of Paul's homiliary, there is no entry for it in the original collection. In the expanded version of the homiliary printed in PL 95, one text is appointed for the Vigil of All Saints (a section of Bede's commentary on Luke)⁵⁸⁷ and three for the Feast of All Saints proper: one attributed to Bede beginning "Hodie, dilectissimi, omnium sanctorum," one attributed to Bede beginning "Legitur/Legimus in ecclesiasticis historiis," and Leo the ⁵⁸⁵ Readings for All Saints do not appear within Anglo-Saxon lectionaries until the latter half of the tenth century. Lenker reports that Matt 5:1–12 appears as the All Saints' reading in manuscripts Qa, Qb, Qc, Sx, Vb, Vx, Wa, Wb, and A. The only Anglo-Saxon lectionaries that have All Saints' but do not appoint this reading for the feast are the Type 3 alt group—Sa, Sb, Sd, and Se. All of them do, however, appoint it for the Vigil of the feast. The feast itself receives Luke 6:17–23 which is the Synoptic parallel to Matt 5:1–12 according to both modern and medieval reckonings.

_

⁵⁸⁶ This lection is appointed for the feasts of The Seven Brothers, martyrs (July 10th) in a wide number of lectionaries reflecting a widespread assignment going back to Chavasse's stage 2 (Oa, Pa, Pb, Pc, Pg, Ph, Qa, Qb, Qc, Sa, Sb, Sc, Sd, and Se). One 9th century capitulary (Qe) uses it as the reading for Sts Tiburtius, Valerianus, and Maximus, martyrs (April 14th), Sts Felix, Simplicus, Faustinus, and Beatrix, martyrs (July 29th), Sts Cosmus and Damian, martyrs (Sept 27th) as well as the Common for Plural Martyrs. The 11th century New Minster Missal (Wa) uses it for Sts Marcus and Marcellianus, martyrs (June 18th) and Sts Dionysius, Rusticus, and Eleutherius, martyrs (Oct 9th). It also appears as the Common for Plural Martyrs in Vb, Wh, and Ya and as the Common for Plural Confessors in Ph and Vb.

⁵⁸⁷ Paul the Deacon, Homiliae de Sanctis LXI (PL 95:1535c-d).

⁵⁸⁸ Paul the Deacon, Homiliae de Sanctis LXII (PL 95:1535d).

⁵⁸⁹ Paul the Deacon, Homiliae de Sanctis LXIII (PL 95:1535d-1536a).

Great's Sermon 95 on the beatitudes.⁵⁹⁰ Furthermore, the expanded version includes a section from Augustine's De Sermone Domini in Monte treating the beatitudes for the Feast of Several Martyrs.⁵⁹¹

Ælfric's sermon falls neatly into two parts, the first utilizing "Legimus in ecclesiasticis historiis," the second drawing from Augustine's De Sermone Domini in Monte. ⁵⁹² He has thus created a sermon by combining two elements of the Night Office—the sermo of the second nocturn that gives general information about the feast day, and the omelia of the third nocturn that provides an exegetical explanation of the Gospel of the Day. There is no doubt, then, that the liturgical experience of the Night Office is directly responsible for the shape of this sermon.

However, Ælfric then uses a clever sleight of hand to fit the sermon to a new context, accomplished by altering the beginning of the Ps-Bedan "Legimus." Ælfric reproduces the text relatively faithfully but for one major exception. The sermon in all of its variations invariably begins with an historical account of the consecration of the Pantheon as a church dedicated to Mary and all saints. It then glorifies the God who enabled these humans and angels to become saints, then moves into the various categories. This kind of introduction is not an uncommon one for early medieval sermons about liturgical feasts with a particular history. Classic examples include sermons for St Michael and All Angels and the Rogation Days; both anonymous Old English sermons⁵⁹³ and Ælfric's own sermons⁵⁹⁴ for these occasions begin with this historical data.

Here, however, Ælfric has stripped out the historical material and has replaced it with the Epistle reading. Where the original sermon begins with an historical incident which

-

⁵⁹⁰ Paul the Deacon, Homiliae de Sanctis LXIII (PL 95:1535d-1536a). Paul's selection begins at Serm. XCV.2 rather than the start of the sermon.

⁵⁹¹ Paul the Deacon, Homiliae de Sanctis LXXXI (PL 95:1550d-1551a).

⁵⁹² See Godden, Commentary, 199 and Smetana, "Early Medieval Homiliary," 194-5.

⁵⁹³ See Blickling 16 which describes the historical events surrounding the dedication of the church to St Michael in Garganus, Italy, and Vercelli 19 which describes the origins of the Rogation days in Vienna.

⁵⁹⁴ See CH I.18 on the Rogation days and Ch I.29 on the Feast of St Michael.

refers to all of the saints, both angelic and human, which then prompts the author to describe the various types, Ælfric introduces the Scripture passage which mentions all the saints. He has taken a sermon which explains an occasion and has turned it into an exegetical explanation of the Epistle simply by replacing the introduction.

This change removes the sermon from the context of the Night Office—where the Epistle was not read⁵⁹⁵—and suits it for use in the Mass of the Day—where the Epistle was read. Through this clever adaptation, Ælfric has redirected and retargeted his composition and once again demonstrated the fundamental fluidity that marks early medieval preaching. It is not enough to consider a single context—liturgical or otherwise. Rather, the whole scope of the liturgical lifecycle should be considered to properly assess its impact on any given homiletical text.

Both Ælfric's sermon and "Legimus" are fundamentally structured by their liturgical environments. This may be demonstrated by examining their structure and order. From a modern perspective, they seem to follow a natural order—that is, a historical progression from the earliest times to the most modern. While this is true, the order is far more deeply invested in and reinforced by liturgical categories than historical ones. The way that the saints are grouped is fundamentally reflective of liturgical categories. After all, they are other ways that they could have been grouped; by class—saints who were kings, saints who were soldiers, and saints who were commoners—or by people/language—Greek saints, Egyptian saints, Roman saints, Germanic saints. But they are not.

Instead, this sermon participates in a standard liturgical schema for categorizing the saints and utilizes it as a catechetical tactic for instructing the laity. First, the saints presented after John the Baptist are both in the categories and order found in the commune sanctorum. In ⁵⁹⁵ Verbal traces of and passing references to the Epistle text appear in some of the antiphons and responsories, but the text itself is not read.

⁵⁹⁶ Ælfric would seem to participate in this by identifying historical eras which his source does not do. Rather than seeing this as a sign of an incipient historicizing mind-set, it is far more plausible to see it as yet another expression of the 'six ages of the world' motif so popular among Anglo-Saxon exegetes.

a standard sacramentary, lectionary, or homiliary, the entries for the Temporale and Sanctorale would be followed by a group of generic templates for use in celebrating local or, at least, non-universal saints. They were arranged in order of their liturgical importance and came with both singular and plural versions—Common of One Apostle, of Many Apostles, of One Martyr, of Many Martyrs, of One Confessor, of Many Confessors, of One Virgin, and of Many Virgins. The commune sanctorum was never a completely formalized set, however. While there is no unanimous agreement between the sources, the general order and classes of saints are consistent with one another and with the categories sketched by both sermons.

The order then appears in a host of materials designed to communicate and reinforce these classes of sanctity. The Te Deum, a foundational canticle used in the Night Office on every Sunday and feast uses the same key groups:

To you [God] all angels, all the powers of heaven,

Cherubim and Seraphim, sing in endless praise:

Holy, holy, holy Lord, God of power and might, heaven and earth are of full of your glory.

The glorious company of apostles praise you.

The noble fellowship of prophets praise you.

The white-robed army of martyrs praise you.

Throughout the world the holy Church acclaims you...⁵⁹⁷

The groupings are then taken up and found scattered throughout the liturgy. For instance, one of the psalm antiphons used in some communities for Lauds rehearses the full list:

_

⁵⁹⁷ Translation from The Book of Common Prayer (New York: Church Publishing, 1979), 91.

Angels, archangels, thrones and dominions, principalities and powers, virtues: cherubim and seraphim, patriarchs and prophets, holy doctors of the law, all apostles, martyrs of Christ, holy confessors, virgins of the Lord, anchorites, and all saints, pray for us.⁵⁹⁸

Similarly, the hymns appointed in the Winchester Hymnals, ⁵⁹⁹ Festiva saeclis colitur ⁶⁰⁰ and Christe, redemptor omnium, conserva ⁶⁰¹ praise in turn the Virgin Mary, angels, patriarchs, prophets, John the Baptist, Apostles, martyrs, confessors, virgins, and monks. Inspired by "Legimus," Ælfric turns this monastic common-place into a catechetical tool to teach the laity about the various classes of angels and saints venerated by the church.

Within the corpus of commonly used responsories, three proceed directly from the beatitudes. Of these, the most common and most widely used across the early manuscripts focuses on the same beatitude Ælfric does:

Beati qui persecutionem (CAO 6183)

R: Blessed are those who suffer persecution on account of righteousness, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven; blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God.

V: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers ... 602

Another frequently seen conclusion to the responsory was to repeat the Response at the end of the Verse beginning with "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven..." Exegetically, the latter form reinforces that all of the beatitudes are ultimately oriented towards attaining the kingdom.

The recapitulation of the reception of the kingdom of heaven is a feature of another responsory which utilizes the same beatitudes (and adding one) in a different configuration:

⁵⁹⁸ Angeli, archangeli, Throni et Dominationes, Principatus et Potestates, Virtutes: Cherubim atque Seraphim: Patriarchae et Prophetae: sancti legis Doctores, Apostoli omnes: Christi Martyres, sancti Confessores, Virgines Domini, Anachoritae, Sanctique omnes, intercedite pro nobis. CAO 1398—expanded form.

⁵⁹⁹ This was family of hymnals used by both Æthelwold and Ælfric as is made clear by a comparison of hymnal rubrics and liturgical directions in the RC and LME. This family is represented by three hymnals: Cambridge, Corpus Christi College 391; the Expositio hymnorum from London, BL, Cotton Vespasian D.xii; and the Expositio hymnorum from London, BL, Cotton Julius A.vi. See Milfull, 9-13.

⁶⁰⁰ Hymn 98. Millful, Hymns, 358-360.

⁶⁰¹ Hymn 99. Millful, Hymns, 361-363.

⁶⁰² CAO 6183a. Beati qui persecutionem patiuntur propter justitiam, quoniam ipsorum est regnum coelorum; beati pacifici, quoniam filii Dei vocabuntur. V. Beati mundo corde, quoniam ipsi Deum videbunt. - Beati.
⁶⁰³ See CAO 6183b,c.

Beati mundo corde (CAO 6180)

R: Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God; blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called sons of God. Blessed are those who suffer persecution on account of righteousness, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.

V: Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness. For theirs is the kingdom of heaven.⁶⁰⁴

Again, receiving the kingdom is emphasized. The other responsory⁶⁰⁵ utilizing the beatitudes simply presents the makarisms in the order of the Matthean Latin text⁶⁰⁶ not present in these two.

Thus, looking at the liturgical context of Ælfric's sermon for All Saints, we see once again the fluidity of function that existed concerning early medieval homiliaries. While modern scholars may prefer to assign some to the Night Office and others to the Mass, actual texts like Ælfric's show that such a rigid categorization was not kept in early medieval monasteries. However, signs of a context wherein a particular sermon originated and where it was intended to be delivered can indeed yield useful clues to the compositional process.

The liturgical background places emphasis on two points specifically addressed by Ælfric, the first being the categorization of the holy ones that Ælfric transforms into a catechetical tool, the second being the exegetical emphasis on the final beatitude. As the responsory rearranges the beatitudes to put the last in first place, so Ælfric awards pride of place to the blessedness of persecution when it is for the sake of righteousness.

⁶⁰⁴ CAO 6180. Beati mundo corde, quoniam ipsi Deum videbunt; beati pacifici, quoniam filii Dei vocabuntur; beati qui persecutionem patiuntur propter justitiam, quoniam ipsorum est regnum coelorum. V. Beati qui esuriunt et sitiunt justitiam. - Quoniam ipsorum.

⁶⁰⁵ CAO 6181. R. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven; blessed are the meek, for they shall possess the earth; blessed are those who weep, for they shall be consoled; blessed are they who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they shall be filled, V. Blessed are the merciful, for they shall be shown mercy. Blessed are those who hunger... [Beati pauperes spiritu, quoniam ipsorum est regnum coelorum; beati mites, quoniam ipsi possidebunt terram; beati qui lugent, quoniam ipsi consolabuntur; beati qui esuriunt et sitiunt justitiam, quoniam ipsi saturabuntur. V. Beati misericordes, quoniam ipsi misericordiam consequentur. - Beati qui esuriunt.]

⁶⁰⁶ See the introductory material.

Discussion

Surveying the modern works on the beatitudes, a single issue consistently rises to the fore: ethics or eschatology. Martin Dibelius was the first major proponent of an eschatological understanding of the Sermon on the Mount in his 1940 book of the same name. Current scholarship wrestles with the proper place of eschatology and ethics in the sermon as a whole and the beatitudes in particular and the authors we have surveyed participate in that struggle. All four of the modern interpretations acknowledge that both ethics and eschatology are in view; in all of them, the eschatological dimension is foregrounded, the ethical receding into the background. In short, they programmatically present an inclusive both/and rather than an exclusive either/or—but practically present the eschatological over the ethical.

Historically speaking, if one option needs to be stressed, then the eschatological deserves it—the history of interpretation has greatly emphasized the ethical and the spiritual. Certainly Leo and Augustine understood the beatitudes to be describing a set of discrete steps to holiness. Leo describes the purpose of the beatitudes thus: "that they who wish to arrive at eternal blessedness may understand the steps of ascent to that high happiness." Augustine refers to the sermon as a whole as "a perfect standard of the Christian life" and describes the sequence of makarisms as a set of stages (gradu) that lead to completeness and spiritual perfection.

While Ælfric refers to the beatitudes as being ordered (geendebyrd)⁶¹⁰ and uses the term grade or step (stæpe)⁶¹¹ he does not present Augustine's theory of the beatitudes. Rather than presenting them as steps in a system, he simply elucidates each makarism with an ⁶⁰⁷ Martin Dibelius, The Sermon on the Mount (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1940).

⁶⁰⁸ Leo the Great, Sermon 95.2. NPNF2 12.203.

⁶⁰⁹ Augustine, Sermon on the Mount 1.1. NPNF 6.3.

⁶¹⁰ L. 150.

⁶¹¹ L. 250.

explanatory gloss. It is worth considering whether Ælfric knew of Augustine's strategy and chose not to follow it (especially given his concluding notice: "We might treat this holy reading much more following Augustine's interpretation but we doubt whether you may profitably understand more depth"), 612 or if the portion included in his edition of Paul the Deacon concluded before Augustine's elaboration. 613 Nevertheless, Ælfric consistently lifts up the ethical implications, understanding them to describe not only proper Christian behavior, but identifying monasticism as the preferred state for Christians. 614 Looking, therefore, at the texts of patristic and early medieval interpreters, the ethical is well represented—the eschatological seems absent.

Is there anything that an early medieval reading of the beatitudes could contribute to the modern scholarly discussion? One of the difficulties flowing from the modern interpreters surveyed here is understanding how to hold the ethical and the eschatological in a creative tension. Can the medievals suggest an alternate paradigm for holding these two meanings together? Leo and Augustine contain such a paradigm implicitly; Ælfric moves towards making it more explicit through his utilization of the "Legimus" sermon. The liturgical context is the catalyzing element.

Sanctity or holiness within the early medieval period was not fundamentally about pious moralism but about the manifestation of eschatological power. Saints were not venerated because they were ethical people or followed scriptural rules; their veneration was directly related to their ability to provide supernatural healing to their suppliants.

Attempting to communicate to modern medievalists the Anglo-Saxon conception of sanctity, Lapidge draws a vivid picture taken from the writings of Lantfred, a monk visiting Winchester in the 970's:

⁶¹² Ll. 282-4.

⁶¹³ It is worth remembering whenever dealing with early medieval citation of patristic authors that they were citing from excerpts far more frequently than from whole texts.

⁶¹⁴ Ll. 192-7.

[Lantfred] shows us the inside of the Old Minster crammed with persons afflicted with appalling physical deformities, festering wounds, blind, paralytic, deaf, dumb, mutilated indescribably by the just process of law or by self-imposed penitential torture, all clustered around the shrine of St Swithun, lying there day and night, moaning in pain and praying aloud for deliverance from their suffering. On occasion, Lantfred reports, the church's precincts were so plugged with diseased persons that they periodically had to be cleared to make way for the clergy.615

But the presence of the diseased is not the end of the story for Lantfred. The incumbent of Winchester responsible for the translation of St Swithun's relics to the Old Minster was the reforming Bishop Æthelwold, Ælfric's teacher. Lantfred recounts that when Æthelwold would leave his seat on official business, the monks would ignore his command to sing a solemn Te Deum at each miraculous cure—since they were being roused three to four times every night on account of Swithun's power!616

One of the responsories appointed for the Feast of All Saints in the early antiphonaries specifically references miraculous cures at the tombs of the saints:

Laudemus Dominum in beati (CAO 7082)

R: Let us praise the Lord on account of the glorious merit of blessed bishop N. The sick came to his sepulcher and were healed.

V: Truly wondrous is God who made blessed N. to shine forth continuously with miracles.

The sick came...617

While moderns may be rightfully skeptical concerning the historicity of the miraculous healings recounted in the lives of the saints and the responsories, these texts present a clear ⁶¹⁵ Lapidge, "The saintly life," 243.

⁶¹⁶ Lantfred's "Life of St Swithun" is translated in pages 252-322 in Michael Lapidge, The Cult of St Swithun (Winchester Studies 4.2; Oxford: Clarendon, 2003).

⁶¹⁷ CAO 7082a. Laudemus Dominum in beati antistitis N. meritis gloriosis: ad sepulcrum ejus aegri veniunt et sanatur. V. Vere mirabilis Deus, qui assidue beatum N. miraculis coruscare facit. - Ad sepulcrum. The version of the antiphon in the CAO is also used as for the common of bishops; the incipit in the referenced manuscript (Paris lat. 1085) presumably refers to a more generic formula for All Saints expectation that the miraculous is an inextricable element of sanctity. Indeed, as a regularized process became universal within the western church the bar for canonization was set at three documented miracles—a criterion still followed today by the Roman Catholic Church.

At the end of the day, the modern and the early medieval monastic approaches to the beatitudes yield different results. The modern perspective identifies the presence of eschatology within the pages of the text. The early medieval monastic finds a moral program to inhabit. But the early medieval perspective offers the modern a broader scope than just the content of the text, locating an eschatological meaning as the result of the embodiment of the text; the eschatological is in the enacting of the text, not just its reading. Thus, the early medieval offers the modern scholarly endeavor the possibility of eschatological force in the results of embodying the text. Eschatology follows from the ethical.

Chapter 5

MATTHEW 8:1–13

Introduction

Matthew 8:1–13 falls into two natural sections, each containing a miraculous healing. While the stories are clearly related by the similarity of their content, the lack of an organic connection between them has often been noted by interpreters. Eusebius, the ancient Greek kephalai, and the majority of the early Western chapter divisions separate the two parts into different units.

The first is a relatively brief account of Jesus healing a leper (Matt 8:1–4). Eusebius identifies it as Triple Tradition and modern editors concur, placing it parallel to Mark 1:40–45 and Luke 5:12–16. Matthew edits Mark's account down slightly, reducing the emotional content and dropping the ending that has the healed man disobey the injunction to silence. Perhaps Matthew's most significant editorial decision is to use this as the point at which he returns to following the Markan storyline after inserting the Sermon on the Mount.

The second unit (Matt 8:5–13) is broken by Eusebius into three sections. The first (Matt 8:5–11a) is identified as an alternate triple tradition—his heading III—that identifies material common to Matthew, Luke, and John. He places Luke 7:1–9 and John 4:46b–54 in parallel. Matt 8:11b–12 and 13 are identified as Double Tradition and paired with Luke 13:28b–29 and Luke 7:10 respectively. Aland's Synopsis concurs. 618 Clearly not a straightforward miracle story, the passage hovers between apothegma and a miracle.

⁶¹⁸ Kurt Aland, ed. Synopsis Quattor Evangeliorum (13th revised edition; Stuttgart: Deutsch Bibelgesellschaft, 1985), 113-6.

Modern Interpreters

Ulrich Luz

Luz begins his analysis with an overview of Matthew 8–9 where he compares Matthew's interweaving of themes in this section to a braid. There is a narrative movement in this section of Matthew reinforced by the repetitious character of the story: "Above all, the miracles of Jesus of which 4:23 already spoke are repeated, as are the idea of discipleship and the emerging conflicts with Israel's leaders." Luz sees a great climax coming at the end of chapter 9 that creates the first major rupture in Jesus' mission to Israel; chapters 8 and 9 set the stage for that event.

But something else is going on as well: "In chap. 8 we have the beginning of a story of Jesus on two levels." Luz proposes that chapter 8 begins an allegory that underlies the material though he does not say here how far it extends. The allegory does not reveal a deeper moral or spiritual meaning but rather an historical one:

The surface structure of our text describes a succession of miracles and controversy dialogues that are geographically and chronologically connected. They are part of a story of Jesus with his people that will end with his execution and resurrection. It is a story of increasing conflict and of a rupture among the people. Beneath this surface level there is a deeper dimension. On this second level Matthew begins to tell the foundational story of his own church. It is a story that began with the activity of Jesus in Israel, that continued with the formation there of the community of disciples and with its separation from Israel, and that will end with its mission to the Gentiles.⁶²¹

Thus the allegory chronicles the tensions that arose between Matthew's post-resurrection community and their Jewish neighbors that would eventually become an inevitable split.

⁶²¹ Ibid.

⁶¹⁹ Luz, Matthew 8-20, 2.

⁶²⁰ Ibid.

Reading this allegory, the second level of the text, is an important part of Luz's interpretation of this pericope.

Luz places Matt 8:1–17 under the heading "Jesus Heals in Israel" and notes that the three stories here are tied together by the main words. The quotation in v. 17 "concludes and interprets" the story cluster. The healing of the leper is treated succinctly; using only two and a half pages, Luz moves through the narrative with some dispatch, with only a few details given much attention. He notes in v. 1 that "The phrase 'follow after' characterizes [the people] as potential church, but the evangelist will not develop this thought until vv. 18-27." The use of Lord in v. 2 is significant and points to the sovereignty by which Jesus heals without appeal to the Father. The command to keep the Law is given some attention, because it is closely related to the meaning toward which Luz is driving.

Speaking of Jesus' command to the leper to show himself to the priest, Luz uses the command to make a statement about how Matthew constructs Jesus' messiahship:

For Matthew it is important that the person who is healed keep the Torah of Moses at the command of Jesus (cf. 5:17–19!). The key word $\kappa\alpha\theta\alpha\rho$ i $\zeta\omega$ ("to be clean") that is used three times also shows that we are now dealing with Israel and its law. Until modern times $\mu\alpha\rho\tau$ u ρ iov ("testimony") was interpreted, probably incorrectly, as a sign of judgment on Israel; but it is more likely that what is meant is a positive witness initially for the priests, but then for all the people who are listening: As Israel's Messiah Jesus keeps the Torah.

As the first sequence in a story of increasing conflict with the religious authorities, Luz sees

Jesus making an entirely open and honorable first move that should please those authorities.

623 Luz, Matthew 8-20, 5.

⁶²² Luz, Matthew 8-20, 4.

⁶²⁴ Luz, Matthew 8-20, 6.

⁶²⁵ Ibid.

Summarizing the meaning, Luz makes reference to a "curious double quality," functioning for him as a signal that the allegorical level is at work. On one hand he sees the leper as a sympathetic character in whom the readers see themselves:

...the leper addresses Jesus as "Lord" and falls at his feet. He acts, in other words, like a disciple and Jesus stretches out his hand over him as he does over the disciples (12:49; 14:31). He thus becomes for the readers of the Gospel, who of course are also disciples, a figure with whom they can identify.⁶²⁶

Luz does not, however, refer to the leper as an exemplary character. His main focus is on the second level meaning: "The healed leper embodies, in a way, the basic unity between discipleship and Israel and thus is a witness for the people." This is crucial: in an emerging struggle over negotiating identity, Luz sees this first miracle as a sign that there need not be a choice between being a faithful member of the Jewish people and a follower of Christ. Christianity need not be a repudiation of Jewish identity. This has been ignored throughout the history of Christian interpretation, though, and Luz finds possibilities here for a post-Shoah understanding of "the potential meaning of Jesus' love for Israel." 1000 people is on the second level meaning of Jesus' love for Israel.

Moving to the healing of the centurion's son,⁶²⁹ Luz identifies it as a mixed form story sharing characteristics of an apothegm and a miracle story.⁶³⁰ He understands John 4:46–53 as a secondary version of the same story which might have an historical kernel; the apothegm in vv. 11–12 might also go back to Jesus.⁶³¹

As with the first miracle, the second functions on both of Luz's levels and he moves through the story with an eye to arriving at his final interpretation. Operating with Jesus'

-

⁶²⁶ Ibid.

⁶²⁷ Ibid.

⁶²⁸ Luz, Matthew 8-20,7.

⁶²⁹ In distinction to many interpreters, Luz insists that $\pi\alpha$ iς here means "son" rather than "servant"/"slave" with particular reference to the use of δοῦλος in v. 9.

⁶³⁰ Luz, Matthew 8-20, 8.

⁶³¹ Luz, Matthew 8-20, 9.

concern for the Law in mind, Luz sees v. 7 as "an astonished question" that Jesus would so break the Law; the centurion's reply indicates a reverence for the Law despite not falling under it. 632 Vv. 10–12 intimate the first signs of the struggle on the narrative horizon. 633

Luz begins his summary by referring to the story's multidimensional character. It is the story of a miracle that demonstrates the miraculous sovereignty of Jesus. The main meaning, though, refers to the Gentile identity of the centurion and its implications for the mission to Israel and the future direction of Matthew's community. The Gentile who stands outside of the Law yet respects it and possesses faith in Jesus is both the trigger for a warning to Israel and Matthew's own experience:

Matthew has experienced both Israel's no to Jesus and the destruction of Jerusalem. He has seen many Gentiles turning to Jesus, and he challenges his own church to become involved in the gentile mission. The threatening word is for him also a prediction that exactly describes his own situation. . . . [T]he centurion of Capernaum is a marginal figure with a future perspective. . . . [T]his perspective is important for readers in Matthew's church, for in the story of Jesus they recognize their own way. It is a way that, after Easter, leads them into conflict with Israel, out of Israel into the gentile world, and then in that world to the proclamation of the gospel to the Gentiles. 634

The presence of this character at this point in the story foreshadows how the conflict will develop and serves as a call to mission for the Matthean community.

The other meaning refers to the example of the centurion and Luz affirms the interpretation of this character often found within the church:

-

⁶³² Luz, Matthew 8-20, 10.

⁶³³ Luz, Matthew 8-20, 10-11.

⁶³⁴ Luz, Matthew 8-20, 11, 12.

[Our story] emphasizes the faith of the centurion and gives the readers courage in their own faith. The centurion becomes for them a figure with whom they can identify. The church's interpretation has always correctly understood it this way when the centurion became either the type of true humility or a model of faith. The story thus becomes transparent for the reader's own experience. The granting of the centurion's request becomes the promise to the church that lives by virtue of its Lord's support (28:20).635

Matthew intends the righteous God-fearing, Law-respecting centurion as a model for all of his readers, Jew and Gentile.

In conclusion, Luz acknowledges the plain fact of the healing miracles in each episode. They perform a narrative role in setting up the coming conflict, but the greater significance in these stories points to Luz's historical allegory where the conflict referred to in the narrative is a lived reality. These stories affirm for Matthew's community that there does not need to be a choice between Jewish and being Christian. Because most of the Jewish people will not grasp unity, however, the community must bring into the fold those Gentiles who respect the Law and have faith in Israel's Messiah.

Davies and Allison

Davies and Allison begin by locating the whole complex of Matthew 8–9 in complementary parallel with Matthew 5–7. These two sections represent "a two panel presentation which typifies Jesus' ministry. In 5–7 Jesus speaks. In 8–9 he (for the most part) acts. It is thereby shown that God in Christ heals by both words and by mighty deeds."⁶³⁶ Furthermore, the characters that appear in this second section "are generally recognized to be either from the margins of Jewish society or to be without public status or power."⁶³⁷ Despite this common characteristic, though, there is no general agreement on the main themes of the block and they rehearse eight main options for how the structure of the two chapters should be understood. Their solution is to see it as a set of three triads of miracle stories. Our pericope forms the first part of the first section which they extend to 8:22.

⁶³⁵ Luz, Matthew 8-20, 12.

⁶³⁶ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.1.

⁶³⁷ Ibid.

The function of Matthew 8–9 as a whole, however, is best understood within the complex of Matthew 5–10. This six chapter block "depicts the mission to the lost sheep of the house of Israel"638 and furthermore communicates the central paradigm of discipleship:

... chapters 5-7 and 8-9 prepare for chapter 10, in which Jesus instructs his missionaries on what they should preach and how they should act. The many parallels between what Jesus has already said and done and what they disciples will say and do demand that one function of the miracle chapters is to set up an example: like master, like disciple (cf. 10.24f.). The Jesus of Mt 8–9 is a model. One must not only learn his words (5–7) but copy his acts, that is, imitate his behaviour. As pupil with rabbi, the disciple of Jesus learns by normative precept (5-7) and by normative example (8-9).639

As a result, what occurs in 8–9 should be seen in continuity with and illustrative of the teachings recorded in 5-7. Davies and Allison understand the imitation of Christ to be an overarching theme found in the narrative.

The actual analysis of the first triad of miracle stories that includes Matt 8:1–13 begins by noting the structure—three miracle stories (8:1–15) and buffer material (8:16– 22)—then moves quickly to sources. A longer analytical unit identifies this section split between double and triple tradition material as a typical knot of the Synoptic problem rather than part of its solution. ⁶⁴⁰ A preface to the exegetical phrase-by-phrase unit provides guidance about what will be uncovered:

⁶³⁸ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.5.

⁶⁴⁰ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.7.

Two themes are highlighted by 8.1–22. First, the three healing stories and the summary in vv. 16–17 show forth Jesus rôle as compassionate healer and extraordinary miracle worker. Secondly, those healed all belong to the fringes of Jewish society: a leper, a Gentile youth, a woman, demoniacs. This fact reflects the universalism of Matthew's Jesus: the salvation he offers is for all. It is not for any privileged group.⁶⁴¹

Having identified these emphases, Davies and Allison only occasionally reference them, preferring them to stay in the background and exert a subtle influence over the rest of the interpretation. That is, they are consistent themes, not hermeneutical agendas.

Davies and Allison see the first miracle as having a number of significant facets, most of them revolving around leprosy: the miracle illustrates what came before it, sets up what will follow it, and makes a Christological statement. This miracle immediately follows the Sermon on the Mount "primarily because of the reference to the law Moses commanded. Jesus' injunction to follow the Pentateuchal legislation happily illustrates one of the central themes of the sermon on the mount: Jesus did not come to do away with Moses (cf. 5.17–19)." Likewise, it looks ahead to chapters 10 and 11 where the healing of lepers is a sign of eschatological expectation fulfilled (11:5) and where Jesus, in a move unique to Matthew, specifically grants his disciples power to heal leprosy as well as other ailments (10:8). Last, the combination of eschatological expectation fulfillment with the intertextual recognition that only powerful prophetic figures were able to cure leprosy in the OT—particularly Moses and Elisha—makes Jesus' healing of leprosy a sign of his Christological power.

In contrast to other interpreters (Chrysostom is specifically mentioned) Davies and Allison take Matt 5:17–19 to be determinative regarding Matthew's belief about Jesus ⁶⁴¹ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.8.

⁶⁴² Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.10.

⁶⁴³ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.12. Davies and Allison note that this extension of power further solidifies the imitation Christi theme.

⁶⁴⁴ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.11.

touching a leper; such a touch did not break the Mosaic Law. Further, they believe it is unlikely that Matthew believed such a touch would have made Jesus ceremonially unclean.

A certain amount of space is spent on the question of the historicity of the episode. Of the five encounters with lepers listed in the New Testament, 645 they judge the first, second, and fifth convincing enough to state that: "Jesus was accurately remembered as a man whose healing ministry encompassed even lepers."

The second miracle story (8:5–13), is identified as "more a pronouncement story than a miracle story." At the outset it is placed in parallel with John 4:46–54. The question at hand is historical: do the two accounts—Q and John—reflect two different episodes or one episode and what conclusions can be drawn concerning its historicity? The coherence of elements between the two and the fact of its early multiple attestation lead them to conclude that "Mt 8.5–13 par. preserves a concrete memory from the ministry of Jesus." A historical kernel lies at the root of the tradition but its precise details cannot be determined.

Davies and Allison note two meanings of the centurion. First, he is a Gentile. As a character, he foreshadows what will occur later in Matthew and in history. In connection with the magi he helps maintain a minor but consistent Gentile presence in the Gospel even during the mission to Israel. Second, he is "a paradigm for the believer in so far as he exhibits true faith . . . This is why his faith is mentioned not once but twice." Thus another character in addition to Jesus is put forth as a model for imitation.

The heart of the interpretation weighs questions of ethnicity and geography. The presence of a Gentile character within a block specifically identified as the mission to the lost sheep of the house of Israel forces some interpretive choices. As a result, Davies and Allison

⁶⁴⁵ Matthew 8:1–4 and parallels; Matt 11:5=Luke 7:22; Luke 17:11–19; Matt 10:8, and the mention of Simon the leper (Ibid.)

⁶⁴⁶ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.12.

⁶⁴⁷ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.17.

⁶⁴⁸ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.18.

⁶⁴⁹ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.19.

take Jesus' speech in v. 7 as interrogative rather than indicative; the reflexive εγώ signals that it should be understood as a question, not a statement. Too, while they note that v. 8 could follow either a statement or a question the implication (probably correct) is that it more naturally follows a question. As in the case of the Canaanite woman, though, faith is what gives the centurion a hearing and prompts Jesus' miraculous response. Perhaps the most curious part of the interpretation taken in accord with their overarching theme is the argument that the phrase "many from the east and west" refers to Jews of the diaspora rather than Gentiles.

In conclusion, Davies and Allison take the two healing miracles that begin Matt 8 as episodes that both confirm the sermon on the mount and provide examples of the works that the disciples will later accomplish in imitation of Jesus. While part of the larger mission to Israel, they represent Jesus' care and concern for those on the margins of Israel which includes both the unclean and foreigners.

Eugene Boring

Boring offers brief commentary on the pericope, letting it speak for itself as a narrative. In a lengthy excursus after Matthew 8–9, Boring discussed the interpretation of miracles for the modern context in some detail. This effective section seeks to reframe their interpretation, insisting that a belief in the factuality of the miracles recorded in Matthew is not an adequate yardstick for Christian or biblical faith;⁶⁵³ rather, their importance—and value to modern Christian communities—lies in the Christological claims inherent within them. Because of this section, he does not engage here issues of miracles and meaning—the Christological meaning is implicit in the form.

-

⁶⁵⁰ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.21-2.

⁶⁵¹ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.22.

⁶⁵² Davies and Allison, Matthew, 2.27-8.

⁶⁵³ He reminds his readers that all first century people believed in miracles and believed that Jesus did them. Not all of these people, however, believed in Jesus as Christ. In this way he effectively divorces a belief in the facticity of miracles from the confession of Jesus as Christ, enabling him to place an emphasis on the latter rather than the former.

Boring places the Matt 8–9 block in direct relationship with Matt 5–7, stating that it has: "been constructed by Matthew as a single integrated unit presenting Jesus as 'Messiah in deed' (cf. 11:2), corresponding to 5:1–7:29 as 'Messiah in word' (7:28 and Introduction). The picture of Jesus speaking and acting with 'authority' binds together the two sub-sections." Boring sees the structure of three triads of miracles plus one as "another reflection of the Moses typology that shimmers through Matthew's compositional strategy." There are more than just miracles here, though; discipleship material is an integral part of the block "which underscores the Matthean conviction that Christology and discipleship (ecclesiology) are inseparably related." Thus, the section as a whole he entitles "Miracles and Discipleship"; the pericope 8:1–13 is contained in the first of three subsections, the one entitled "Christ Acts in Power for the Marginal and Excluded."

Though Boring's treatment of the healing of the leper receives only two long paragraphs, he deftly packs a number of exegetical observations into the brief space. Noting that the rabbis equated leprosy and its healing with death and resurrection, Boring states that "Matthew has rearranged the sequence of his source to begin with this story, which symbolizes the human situation and the saving work of God in Christ, who restores people to life and community, and also to emphasize Jesus' respect for the Torah." Boring's deliberate ambiguity in referring to "the human situation and the saving work of God in Christ" provides ample space for modern readers to find theological meaning in the story. He draws attention to the leper's use of Lord, his confession of "faith appropriate to the post-Easter exalted Lord" and dependence on "Jesus' sovereign will" and, furthermore, that Jesus' response is commensurate with these things. 659

⁶⁵⁴ Boring, "Matthew," 222.

⁶⁵⁵ Boring, "Matthew," 223.

⁶⁵⁶ Ibid.

⁶⁵⁷ Ibid.

⁶⁵⁸ Boring, "Matthew," 224.

⁶⁵⁹ Boring, "Matthew," 225.

A discussion of Jesus' command focuses on both Jesus' obedience to the Law and the social aspects of the priestly pronouncement of cleanliness. The Markan secret is now a Matthean urging to hasten and perform the Law. A sudden twist on Jesus' attention to the Law concludes the section: "In this pericope Jesus both upholds the Law (as in 5:17) and transcends it, technically violating it (in touching the leper, 8:3; cf. Lev 5:3; 14-15). The pericope thus has the same dialectical attitude toward the Law as do the antitheses (see 5:21– 48)."660 Boring supplies no motive on the part of either Matthew or Jesus for the violation of the Law.

Boring's treatment of 8:5-13 is more lengthy and, following Matthew's own tendencies, focuses on the dialogue rather than the narrative. Boring understands v. 7 as a "question expressing hesitation" 661 that underscores Jesus' commitment to following the Law. The centurion receives the question as "a test of faith—which he passes with flying colors."662 Boring reminds his readers that "the note of disappointment that such faith has not been found in Israel"663 is proleptic—Jesus has just started his acts of ministry and subsequent tour of Israel. Boring is at pains to point out that while the "many from east and west' refers to believing Gentiles . . . [t]his is not, however, necessarily a negation of the promises to Israel, for all Jews are not excluded."664Finally, the miracle's effect is described briefly since the emphasis is not on the miracle itself but on the faith of the centurion.⁶⁶⁵

In the Reflections section (which does not encompass the healing of the leper), Boring explores what is said and left unsaid concerning the centurion and his faith. He reminds his readers that a Roman officer is "an unlikely candidate for faith, and even more so for the other characters in Matthew's story;"666 he is not only a Gentile but a direct

660 Ibid.

⁶⁶¹ Boring, "Matthew," 226.

⁶⁶² Ibid.

⁶⁶³ Ibid.

⁶⁶⁴ Ibid. 665 Ibid.

⁶⁶⁶ Boring, "Matthew," 227.

enforcer of an oppressive system as well. Furthermore, certain qualifications we might expect are left unsaid in Matthew:⁶⁶⁷

One who is looking for evidence of faith in this man may first be struck by what is not said: There is nothing at all about his creed. So far as the story is concerned, we do not even know whether he was a theist, not to speak of monotheism. Yet Matthew speaks of him as a model of faith. What does Matthew want to say to us in this story about the contours of real faith? The man feels compassion for someone else who depends on him. Matthew does not novelistically speculate on the details of the boy's illness or his relationship to the centurion. The story focuses on the centurion's concern for him, a concern that impels him to make a potentially humiliating request. He is not embarrassed to seek out an itinerant Jewish preacher and healer, confess his unworthiness to receive a personal visit, and ask him only to speak the authoritative word of healing for the child.⁶⁶⁸

Jesus is the one who certifies the centurion's faith and points it out to those who follow. Whatever its limits, Matthew's Jesus finds the centurion's faith acceptable. As a result, Boring leaves a certain ambiguity open in both stories. In the first Jesus both keeps and breaks the Law—enjoining its performance but engaging in a technical violation. In the second, the faith of the Gentile is accepted but the scope and nature of that faith is not defined.

Douglas Hare

Hare treats Matt 8:1–11 within the context of the larger block of miracle stories. He identifies a series of ten miracle stories that follow the Sermon on the Mount and, within those, puts the first three healings together into a block, noting that verses 16 and 17 serve as summaries that offer transitions to the next block. All ten of these miracles serve two purposes. On a very basic level, they establish Jesus as a miracle-worker. The second and potentially more important purpose is to make a Christological point about who Jesus is and the nature of his messianic ministry: these miracles demonstrate that Jesus does not perform miracles for his own glorification but rather in obedience to the will of his Father.

_

⁶⁶⁷ Luke supplies some of these by using Jewish elders as intermediaries.

⁶⁶⁸ Boring, "Matthew," 227.

Obedience is paramount.669

Within this overarching schema, Hare sees the first three miracles as a single interpretive unit, drawing out an element common to all three, then discussing how each of the miracles embodies and adds depth to the common theme. He has entitled this block of three "Healing the Excluded" and this title encapsulates his interpretive approach to these texts. He begins his interpretation by making his position explicit: "Matthew's selection of the first three miracles seems to be dictated by the fact that in each case the recipient is excluded from full participation in Israel: the leper is excluded as unclean, the centurion's servant as a Gentile, and Peter's mother-in-law as a woman."⁶⁷⁰ Thus these miracles occupying an important place in Matthew's story of Jesus signal the importance of the theme of inclusion as a whole. They make a Christological statement about Jesus as Messiah: "Jesus is the Messiah by whose power and authority the excluded are included."⁶⁷¹

Taking up the healing of the leper, Hare draws three main points form it in addition to its overall meaning of inclusion. First, it verifies Matt 5:17–19 that Jesus has not come to abrogate the Law. Since Jesus sends the leper to see the priests, he is supporting the practice and fulfillment of the Law. (Hare takes no position on the legality of touching a leper.) Then, Hare finds two useful meanings of the leper beyond the literal meaning that become his second and third points. Second, the leper serves as a paradigm for the Matthean community. The leper's faith is an important part of the story because it shows that the point of the miracle is not to awaken faith but rather to confirm it. Similar to the leper, the readers of ⁶⁶⁹ Hare, Matthew, 87.

⁶⁷⁰ Hare, Matthew, 88.

⁶⁷¹ Hare, Matthew, 90.

Matthew already come to Jesus and his story with faith. Third, the leper offers an example of the bold suppliancy needed by Christians. The leper approached Christ boldly, disregarding the usual distance requirements to come into the presence of Christ and to ask for his healing. Hare exhorts his readers to act with similar boldness in beseeching Christ's gifts.

Rather than offering a comprehensive discourse on the healing of the centurion's servant, Hare prefers to let the episode speak for itself and highlights a few elements for his readers' consideration. He does mention the contrast in the modes of presence in the first two miracles—healing in proximity by touch and at distance with a word—he draws no further attention to the fact on the basis that Matthew does not seem to highlight it either.⁶⁷²

While Hare suggests that the gentile readers of Matthew's community would have been encouraged by the prominent placement of a gentile in the narrative, Hare warns against misreading this fact. He sees the same reluctance present here as in 15:23–24 and interprets the words of Jesus in verse 7 as a question rather a statement. Only the centurion's faith overcomes the Messiah's reluctance. The centurion has rightly perceived that Jesus stands within a chain of authority and, in obedience to God, is entrusted with issuing orders to the angels. Presumably, this facet of the story connects with the overarching theme of obedience that Hare sees connecting the whole of the miracle block.

Last, Hare finds in Jesus' statement on behalf of the gentiles both a Matthean reproach to the Jews who did not follow Jesus but also a warning to all who are complacent in their faith. Transcending the boundaries of the Matthean narrative, Hare warns his comparatively affluent North American and European readers not to trust in their birthright for many will come from the modern East and West—Asia and Africa—as a judgment against those who confess the faith but do not follow it.⁶⁷⁵

673 Hare, Matthew, 90-1.

⁶⁷² Hare, Matthew, 90.

⁶⁷⁴ Hare, Matthew, 91.

⁶⁷⁵ Hare, Matthew, 91-2.

In the main, Hare prefers to offer collected observations upon the narrative, pointing out particular elements of the stories for the edification of his readers. His liberation hermeneutic grounds his reading of the pericope and is augmented with both historical and spiritual interpretations of the text. His spiritual interpretations tend to focus on qualities for emulation within the characters and by means of these offers applications of the text to the modern world.

Ælfric's Interpretation

Homily Proper

Ælfric's interpretation of Matt 8:1–11 is a clearly structured exposition that moves methodically through the Matthean text. The two miracles within the pericope are treated separately; functionally speaking these are two homilies here compressed into a single text. While there are thematic consistencies between the two, Ælfric does not put the two sections into conversation with one another.

Ælfric understands the miracle stories like other narrative passages of the gospels—they are moral discourse to be parsed for virtues to be imitated by the faithful. As far as Ælfric's interpretation is concerned, the chief point of contact between these two healings is that the characters model the same virtues. In both cases, Jesus models humility while the one requesting the healing models faith. As a result, the fundamental message of the pericope as a whole is the importance of humility and the centrality of faith to the Christian life.

Following his usual practice, Ælfric begins with a translation of Scripture. Rather than doing the whole pericope, however, he only translates the initial verse and the first miracle story, Matt 8:1–4. After the translation, he makes reference to Haymo, tacitly identifying him as a source. While within Matthew's narrative 8:1 serves as a transition between the Sermon on the Mount and a cluster of miracle stories, Ælfric sees it operating in a different way. From his perspective, this line is the beginning and introduction to what follows and serves as a statement of purpose rather than transitional material. Reading it allegorically, the descent from the mountain and the following crowd refer to the Incarnation and the company of the faithful:

The teacher Haymo said about this teaching that the mountain on which the Savior stood signified the kingdom of heaven from which the Son of the Almighty God came down when he received our nature and became enfleshed incarnate to men that he might redeem mankind from the power of the devil. He was invisible and impassible in his nature, then he became visible and sensible in our nature. The great many who followed him signified faithful Christians who with their conduct follow the steps of their Lord. Naturally we follow Christ's footsteps if we imitate his examples with good works.⁶⁷⁶

Reading this as an introduction to these two miracles, the good works to be imitated by the faithful naturally refer to the miracles or at least to the virtues displayed and admonitions contained therein.

Instead of moving line-by-line, Ælfric then cites the first half of the miracle that describes the healing itself. This allows him to address the concepts within this thought-complex rather than restricting him to the literal phrases themselves. He begins with a general statement of the miracle's purpose: "In this deed is manifested God's might and his humility." Thus, Ælfric identifies two general ideas around which the rest of the interpretation will turn: the power of God (which we will see is the power to cleanse from both sickness and sin) and the central virtue displayed by Christ, once again the key monastic

_

⁶⁷⁶ Se lareow hægmon cwæð. on þissere trahtnunge. Þæt seo dun þe se hælend of astah getacnode heofenan rice. of þam nyþer astah se ælmihtiga godes sunu: þa ða he underfeng ure gecynd & to menniscum menn geflæschamod wearð. to þy ðæt he mancyn fram deofles anwealde alysde. He wæs ungesewenlic & unþrowigendlic on his gecynde: þa wearð he gesewenlic on urum gecynde. & þrowigendlic. Seo micele meniu þe him fyligde getacnode þa geleaffullan cristenan þe mid heora ðeawa stæpum drihtne fyligað. Witodlice we folgiað Cristes fotswaþum: gif we his gebysnungum mid godum weorcum geefenlæcað. Ll. 15-24.

virtue of humility. Within these stories, humility is defined as counting one's status for naught and thus the willingness to engage people of all stations and conditions, in particular those who fall below one's station by virtue of sickness or status. For the humble, there is no one below them with whom they are ashamed to associate.⁶⁷⁸

Ælfric addresses a number of items in relation to the healing portion of the story. He understands Jesus touching the leper as a violation of Mosaic Law that simultaneously demonstrates his mastery over it, and the humility to reach out to a leper when his word alone could have healed the man:

The law of Moses forbade anyone from touching a leper, but the humble Christ would not scorn him though he was repulsive. He also manifested that he was master of the old law and not its servant. Mightily, he could cleanse him with his words but he touched [him and] thus he manifested that his touch is exceedingly saving to the faithful.⁶⁷⁹

Ælfric then uses the leper's pleas as evidence for his faith: "Faithful was the leper when he said, 'Lord, if you will, you could cleanse me." Not Christ alone but both characters provide models for imitation.

Ælfric then moves from an investigation of the moral qualities embedded in the literal/historical actions to an allegorical and intertextual reading of the significance of the event. The leper symbolizes all humanity who labor under the disease of sin while Jesus is the one prophesied by Isaiah in the suffering servant songs:

In a spiritual sense, the leper signifies all mankind who are repulsively leprous with manifold sin in the inner man, unless it submit to belief in Christ and prudently perceive that it may ⁶⁷⁸ See the seventh step of humility described in RB 7.51-54: "The seventh step of humility is that a man not only admits with his tongue but is also convinced in his heart that he is inferior to all and of less value..." (RB 7.51).

⁶⁷⁹ Moyses æ forbead to hreppenne ænigne hreoflan. ac se eadmoda crist nolde hine forseon þeah þe he atelic wære: & eac geswutelode þæt he wæs hlaford þære ealdan æ. & na þeow. Mihtiglice he mihte mid his worde hine geclænsian buton hrepunge: ac he geswutelode þæt his hrepung is swiðe halwende geleaffullum. Ll. 30-34. 680 Geleafful wæs se hreofla þa ða he cwæð. drihten gif þu wilt. þu miht me geclænsian. Ll. 35-36.

not receive soul cleansing except through the Lord who worked no crime nor was any deceit proper in his mouth. Hateful is the leprous body with many ulcers and swellings and with manifold eruptions, but the inner man—that is, the soul—is more repulsive if it is steeped in manifold sins. We should rightly believe in Christ that he may heal our souls from eruptions of sins and we should constantly bid his will to the progress. His hand signifies his might and his fleshliness. Just as Christ healed the leper by touching with his hands, so he redeemed us from the offenses of our souls through taking on our flesh. Just as the prophet Isaiah said: "Truly he himself carried our infirmities and he himself bore our afflictions." 681

Both the act of healing and the act of touch have christological implications through the fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy. The Isaiah citation is a silent reference to Matthew's own citation of this passage to explain these healing miracles in his summary in Matt 8:17.

The healing proper concluded, Ælfric moves to the meaning of the commands of Jesus to the newly restored man without citing them. He draws from the injunction to silence one of his favorite moral meanings:

With this then he forbade the healed leper that he should speak of this to anyone; with this he gave us an example that we should not celebrate our good deeds but we should shun with an inward heart idle boasts if we do a little good. Naturally if we do good in order to boast we will not be rewarded with any other reward except hell-fire because the boast is a deadly $\sin .682$

⁶⁸¹ On gastlicum andgite getacnode þes hreoflia man eall mancynn þe wæs atelice hreoflig mid mislicum leahtrum on þam inran menn: ac hit gebeah to cristes geleafan. & gleawlice undergeat þæt hit ne mihte þære sawle clænsunge onfon buton þurh drihten þe nane synne ne worhte ne nan facn næs on his muðe gemet. Laðlic bið þæs hreoflian lic mid menigfealdum springum. & geswelle. & mid mislicum fagnyssum: ac se inra mann þæt is seo sawul bið micele atelicor gif heo mid mislicum leahtrum begriwen bið. We sceolon rihtlice gelyfan on crist þæt he ure sawle fram synna fagnyssum gehælan mæge: & we sceolon anrædlice his willan to þære fremminge biddan. His hand getacnað his mihte & his flæsclicnysse. Swa swa crist mid his handa hrepunge þone hreoflian gehælde: swa alysde he us fram ure sawla synnum þurh anfenge ures flæsces. swa swa se witega issaias cwæð. Soðlice he sylf ætbræd ure adlunga. & ure sarnyssa he sylf bær. Ll. 40-53.
682 Mid þam ðe he forbead þam gehæledum hreoflian þæt he hitnanum men ne cydde: mid þam he sealde us bysne. þæt we ne sceolon na widmærsian ure weldæda. ac we sceolon onscunian mid innweardre heortan þone ydelan gylp gif we hwæt lytles to gode gedoð. Witodlice ne bið us mid nanum oþrum edleane forgolden gif we god for gilpe doð buton mid hellesusle. for þan ðe gilp is an heafodleahter. Ll. 54-60.

His attention is focused on the second command of Jesus, however. He explains that the process described in Leviticus for the examination of the leprous and a declaration of their cleanness, then identifies this procedure as a type of sacramental reconciliation and the need for priestly absolution. He joins into a debate of the time concerning who the true actor is in sacramental absolution—if God is the one forgiving, what is the role of the priest? Affirming that God is the one who absolves, Ælfric understands the priest to play a social role in admitting penitents back into the fold or leaving them excommunicate until their condition improves, following the lead of Leviticus:

So shall each who is leprous inwardly with deadly sins come to God's priest and open his secrets to the spiritual healer and by his counsel and his help treat, by repenting, his soul's wounds. Certain men think that it will suffice completely for healing if they confess their sins with a contrite heart to God alone and they do not need to confess to any priest if they wander into evil, but if their belief was true why would the Lord send him who he himself healed to the priest with any sacrifice? For another example of the same, he also sent Paul to the priest Annais whom he himself spoke to from heaven saying thus: "Go into the city and there it will be said what it is fitting to be done."

The priest does not make a man leprous or unleprous, but he deems that he should be separated from the society of men if his leprosy is getting worse or to dwell with men if his leprosy is getting better. So shall the holy priest do. He shall rectify God's people and separate them and excommunicate from Christian men the one so leprous in evil deeds that he will defile others with his evilness. Concerning this the Apostle Paul says: "Expel the evil one from you; lest one ill sheep defile the whole herd." If his leprosy gets better, that is, if he wanders into evil and his habits are rectified through fear of God, he has a dwelling among Christian men until he might be fully healthy in his way of life.⁶⁸³

-

⁶⁸³ Swa sceal eac se þe mid heafodleahtrum wiðinnan reoflig bið. cuman to godes sacerde & geopenian his digelnysse þam gastlican læce: & be his ræde. & fultume his sawle wunda dædbetende gelacnian. Sume men wenað þæt him genihtsumie to fulfremedum læcedome: gif hi heora synna mid onbryrdre heortan gode anum

Here, therefore, Ælfric sees the gospel narrative recommending a specific ecclesial practice whose function is the preservation and protection of the moral and spiritual life of the community, not just the individual.

Ælfric then takes up the rest of the pericope, translating 8:5–13. At the conclusion of the translation he dives directly into its interpretation. Throughout the interpretation of this second miracle, Ælfric mentions social issues pertinent to his day, perhaps in continuity with the social function of penance and excommunication above. He begins with a moral assessment of the centurion who is found to be a paragon of virtue:

The leader of a hundred approached the savior; he did not do so partially but completely. He approached with great faith and with true humility and wisdom and true love. He had great faith when he said, "Lord, say the word and my servant will be healed. Truly he manifested great humility with this when he said, "Lord, I am not worthy that you should come under my roof." He had great wisdom when he understood that Christ is present everywhere through his divinity when he went bodily and visibly among men. Nor did he rob true love when he bid the Lord for the health of his servant. Many other men asked the Lord, some for their own health, some for their children, some for beloved friends but this thane asked for his servant's health with true love because he did not discriminate according to his own kinsmen. The Lord saw this thane's manifold goodness and said, "I will come and heal your servant." 684

ndettað. 6

andettað. & ne þurfon nanum sacerde geandettan gif hi yfeles geswicað: ac gif heora wena soð wære þonne nolde drihten asendan þone þe he sylf gehælde to þam sacerde mid ænigre lace. for þære ylcan gebysnunge. eac he asende paulum þone ðe he sylf of heofonum gespræc: to þam sacerde annanian þus cweðende. Ga into þære ceastre: & þær ðe bið gesæd hwæt þe gedafenað to donne. Ne gedyde se sacerd þone mann hreoflinne. oððe unhreoflinne: ac he demde þæt he sceolde beon ascyred fram manna neawiste gif his hreofla wyrsiende wære: oþðe betwux mannum wunian gif his hreofla godiende wære. Swa sceal don se gastlica sacerd. he sceal geriht-læcan godes folc & þone ascyrian. & amansumian fram cristenum mannum þe swa hreoflig bið on manfullum þeawum þæt he oþre mid his yfelnysse besmit. Be þam cwæð se apostol paulus. Afyrsiað ðone yfelan fram eow: þy læs þe an wanhal scep ealle þa eowde besmite. Gif his hreofla bið godigende: þæt is gif he yfeles geswicð & his þeawas þurh godes ege gerihtlæcð. he hæbbe wununge betwux cristenum mannum. oþ ðæt he ful hal sy on his drohtnungum. Ll. 60-86.

⁶⁸⁴ He genealæhte mid micclum geleafan & mid sopre eadmodnysse. & snoternysse. & soðre lufe. Micelne geleafan he hæfde þa ða he cwæð: drihten. cweð ðin word & min cniht bið hal. Soðlice he geswutelode micele eadmodnysse: mid þam ðe he cwæð. Drihten: ne eom ic wyrðe þæt ðu infare under minre þecene. He hæfde

Both the analysis of the centurion's humility and love touch on issues of standing and social relations. In both cases, embodiment of the gospel virtues allow the centurion to transcend socially located values for the sake of right action. He pleaded for the healing of his servant although the man lay outside his kinship group and thus had no social claim on him. Too, the centurion was willing to forgo his rightful place within the human social hierarchy in recognition (in Ælfric's eyes) of the divinity of Jesus.

Ælfric then brings in a parallel account of the distance healing of a high-status individual's relation to once again speak to the humility of Jesus. Ælfric paraphrases John 4:46–53, then draws a comparison with the Matthean passage. Noting that Jesus heals the prince in John with a word yet offers to come into the presence of the servant in Matthew, Ælfric connects humility with a disregard for human status conveyed by wealth and power, and a recognition of the intrinsic worth of the poor derived from the image of God:

Though invited, the Lord would not go bodily to the king's unhealthy son but—not present—healed him with his word yet he was ready, though uninvited, to go bodily with the centurion. He knew well that the king had more might than any centurion, but the son of Almighty God manifested with this act that we should not honor the rich for their riches but for their [common] human nature. Nor should we scorn the poor for their poverty but we should honor God's likeness in them.⁶⁸⁵

Moving to the action and speech of Jesus, Ælfric briefly notes that Christ's words apply to the current generation rather than Israel historically in order to exempt the prophets and micele snoternysse: þa ða he understod þæt crist is æighwær andwerd þurh godcundnysse: se þe lichamlice betwux mannum gesewenlic eode. Næs he bedæled þære soþan lufe. þa ða he bæd drihten for his þeowan hæle. Manega oðre menn bædon drihten: sume for heora agenre hæle: sume for heora bearna. sume for leofra freonda: ac þes ðegen bæd for his þeowan hælðe. mid soþre lufe: for þan ðe heo ne toscæt nænne be mæglicere sibbe. Drihten geseah þises þegenes menigfealdan godnysse & cwæð. ic cume. & þinne cniht gehæle. ⁶⁸⁵ Drihten nolde gelaðod lichamlice siþian to þæs cyninges untruman bearne: ac unandwerd mid his worde hine gehælde. & he wæs gearo ungelaðod to siþigenne lichamlice mid þam hundreds ealldre. Wel wat gehwa þæt cyning hæfð maran mihte. Þonne ænig hundreds ealdor: ac se ælmiga godes sunu geswutelode mid þære dæde þæt we ne sceolon þa Rican for heora ricetere wurðian: ac for menniscum gecynde. Ne we sceolon þa wanspedigan for heora hafenleaste forseon: ac we sceolon godes anlicnysse on him wurþian. Ll. 127-134.

patriarchs. Without explanation, a quotation from Mary and Martha on the ability to heal Lazarus follows. Then Ælfric presents another Scripture block—Matt 8:11–12—taking up after it those who will come from east and west to rest with the patriarchs. He gives a spatial and temporal interpretation of these words seeing them both as the gentiles and as those who convert in the morning and in the evening. An interesting later addition to the homily (only found in manuscripts N and Q) but coming from Ælfric's hand seeks to resolve the potential contradiction between the "many" mentioned here and the "few" referred to elsewhere:

My brothers, understand this: many will come from east and west and they will rest with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the heavenly kingdom. No earthly king may live like a king unless he has thanes and so arranges his household in a manner befitting his kingship. What do you think? Would not the Almighty King who shaped the heavens and the earth have a boundless household who rule with him? He will have many from humanity for his heavenly household and whoever holds this honor there has it on account of what he has earned here in this world.⁶⁸⁷

Anglo-Saxon court convention drives this interpretation; the more powerful a lord is, the more retainers he can support at his hall. Followers are a sign of status. It is perfectly natural to Ælfric, then, that the Lord of All should have a well-filled hall as a sign of his power and status.

The next section offers a curious interpretation based on a deliberate misreading of the passage. Ælfric writes:

 686 Note the similarity of this interpretation with the explanation of the times to which workers come to the vineyard in his homily for Septuagisima on Matt 20:1-16

⁶⁸⁷ Mine gebroðra understandað þis. Manega cumað fram eastdæle & westdæle & gerestað hi mid abrahame & isaace & iacobe on heofonam rice. Ne mæg nan eorðlic cyning cynelic lybban. Buton he hæbbe ðegenas. & swa gelogodne hired swa his cynescipe gerisan mæge. Hwæt wenst ðu la. Nele se ælmihtiga cyning þe gesceop heofonas & eorðan habban ormætne hired þe him mid rixie. Fela he wile habban of manncynne to hisheofonlican hirede. & gehwa hæfð ðær þone weorðscipe be ðam ðe he her on worulde geearnode. Clemoes, CH I, 533; Ll. 1-8

The saying that follows after is very dreadful. The rich sons are cast into the outer darkness where there is weeping and tooth biting. The rich sons are the Jews. God ruled over them through the old law but they rejected Christ and scorned his teaching and he cast them into the outer darkness where there is weeping and tooth biting. Many rich men may do good if they may be righteous and merciful. The patriarch Abraham, David the great king, and Zaccheus (who gave half his possessions to the poor and with half repaid fourfold what he had earlier unrighteously stolen) were all rich men. These rich men and their like came to the eternal kingdom through conversion to God and did not weary him. 688

The "rich sons" appear nowhere in the Greek text of the passage—or the Vulgate. Ælfric has introduced a deliberate change in order to move away from a literal reading that is of little interest to him and his community to secure a moral reading in line with the rest of his homily. The Old English noun for kingdom (rice) is a homophone for the adjective for rich or wealthy (rice). They are, however, declined differently: "sons of the kingdom" would be rices bearn but Ælfric both here and in the translation above consistently offers rican bearn, "rich sons." Godden finds the error unaccountable since Ælfric was following Haymo's text to this point and Haymo's interpretation makes much of the distinction between Jews and gentiles. Ælfric omits most of this material, retaining only a brief note identifying the "rich sons" as the Jews, and focusing, rather, on the issue of how the rich and powerful may be righteous as well, referring to the topos of the righteous rich to which he appealed in his reading of Matt 5:2.689

-

⁶⁸⁸ Dæs æfterfyligenda cwyde. Is swiðe egeful. Da rican bearn beoð aworpene into þam yttrum þeostrum. Þær bið wop & toþa gebit. Đa rican bearn sid þa iudeiscan: on þam rixode god. þurh þære ealdan æ: ac hi awurpon crist & his lare forsawon. & he awyrpð hi on þa yttran þeostru. Þær ðær bið wop & toþa gebit. Fela ricra manna geþeoð gode: swa ðeah gif hi rihtwise beoð & mildheorte. Rice man wæs se heahfæder Abraham: & dauid se mæra cyning: & zacheus se þe healfe his æhta þearfum dælde. & mid healfum dæle forgeald be feowerfealdum swa hwæt swa he ær on unriht be anfealdum reafode. Þas rican & heora gelican becumað þurh goddre gecyrrednysse to þam ecan rice. þe him næfre ne ateorað.

⁶⁸⁹ While it would be nice to attribute Ælfric's changes to Haymo to a rejection of Haymo's anti-semitism, it seems more likely that he and his community had little or no contact with Jews at all. His explanation of circumcision in his homily for the Feast of the Holy Name seems to assume a complete unfamiliarity with Jews and Jewish customs on the part of his hearers. Thus, Ælfric may have considered exhorting his congregation to

This passage adds circumstantial evidence to Lenker's suggestion that the purpose of the West Saxon Gospels—written in Old English—was exegetical preparation for homilies.⁶⁹⁰ Ælfric's change must have been suggested by looking at an Old English text of the passage. The most secure conclusion that can be drawn is that the change, however it happened, was deliberate and served the advancement of Ælfric's moral reading of the text.

Ælfric then turns to a discussion of the outer darkness, suitably expanded by references to Mark 9. A brief vice list establishes that those with similar sins shall share in similar torments. Ælfric touches on the paradoxical nature of the torments—the dark fire which does not dispel the extreme cold—but does not elaborate on them or offer explanations.

The final line of the passage leads Ælfric into a brief summarizing statement on the importance of faith that concludes with the homily's benediction exhorting its hearers to faith in the Trinity:

Belief is the foremost power of all without which no man may please God and the righteous man lives by his faith. Let us come to believe in the holy trinity and in the true unity that is the Almighty Father and his Son (who is his wisdom) and the Holy Ghost (who is both their love and will); that they are three in person and in name yet one God in their divinity, ever living without beginning or end. Amen.⁶⁹¹

[&]quot;pious" anti-semitism as less edifying then exhorting them to moral reflection on the proper disposition of wealth.

⁶⁹⁰ Lenker, "West Saxon Gospels," 172-4.

⁶⁹¹ Geleafa is aelra mægna firmest. buton þam ne mæig nan man gode lician: & se rihtwisa leofað be his geleafan. Uton gelyfan on þære halgan þrynnysse & on soþre annysse: þæt se ælmihtiga fæder & his sunu þæt is his wisdom & se halga gast se þe us heora begra lufu & willa: þæt hi sind þry on hadum: & on namum. & an gode on anre godcundnysse æfre wuniende buton anginne. & ende. AMEN.

Liturgical context

The season of Epiphany was, according to the early medieval lectionaries, a clearly defined period with its own theological integrity. Following temporally on the heels of the Christmas season, it also follows it theologically; Epiphany represents the working out of themes established by Christmas. The key to the season is the feast of Epiphany itself. Known as both Epiphania ("the manifestation") and Theophania ("the manifestation of God") and the manifestation of God in Jesus. John's prologue (from the Feast of the Nativity) provided further guidance for the lectionary's selection of passages for the season, particularly John 1:10–15. The Epiphany season readings group around three major themes of manifestation described in the prologue: the early miracles of Jesus (the glory, full of grace and truth, of John 1:14), the rejection of Jesus at Nazareth (his own people did not accept him of John 1:11), and the calling of the first followers (those who believed in him, who believed in his name, who became the children of God, from John 1:12).

The playing out of these themes begins with the distribution of biblical events originally clustered on Epiphany itself. In addition to the Vespers antiphon discussed above in chapter 3, the Gospel antiphon appointed for the Lauds of Epiphany by the Portiforium of St Wulstan identifies the three clustered themes and simultaneously places them under a broader interpretive frame: "Today the heavenly Bridegroom was joined to the Church for in the Jordan Christ himself washed away her guilt, the magi ran with gifts to the royal wedding, and the guests were gladdened by wine made from water, alleluia." The reference to the ⁶⁹² The modern Revised Common Lectionary has effectively suppressed the season by making it the first block of Ordinary Time marked by the start of readings in course through the gospel of the year. Only vestiges remain: it retains the traditional themes and emphases for the first two Sundays after Epiphany and—oddly—in the last Sunday after Epiphany/before Lent which it calls the Feast of the Transfiguration. This celebration was moved from August 6th in service of the traditional Epiphany theology which was then suppressed...

⁶⁹³ Both titles are found in Anglo-Saxon lectionaries and missals.

⁶⁹⁴ CAO 3095. Hodie caelesti Sponso iuncta est Ecclesia, Quoniam in Iordane lavit Christus eius crimina; Currunt cum muneribus Magi ad regales nuptias; Et ex aqua facto vino laetantur convivae, alleluia. By the time of the Golden Legend in the 1260's a fourth had been added: the feeding of the five thousand. See the discussion above in ch. 3.

Magi was retained for the feast of Epiphany itself (Matt 2:1–12), with baptismal narratives next placed on the Octave of Epiphany (John 1:29–34) and the Wednesday following the First Sunday after Epiphany (Matt 3:13–17). While the First Sunday after Epiphany completed the biblical account of Jesus' boyhood and the first manifestation of his knowledge of God (Luke 2:42–52), the Second Sunday after Epiphany begins a period of time focused on the first manifestations of Jesus' miraculous powers: the Wedding of Cana (John 2:1–11), identified as the first of Jesus' signs (John 2:11), 695 was appointed for the Second Sunday after Epiphany; the Capernaum Exorcism (Luke 4:31–37), the first miracle narrative in Luke was appointed for the Friday after the Second Sunday after Epiphany; the Healing of the Leper and the Centurion's Servant (Matt 8:1–13) the first miracle narrative in Matthew was appointed for the Third Sunday after the Epiphany. While Matt 8:1–13 is the first block of miracle narratives the occurrence of prior miracles is noted in a summary of Jesus' post-baptismal and pre-Sermon on the Mount activity in Matt 4:23–25—and this passage was appointed for the Friday after the Third Sunday in Epiphany.

As a result of these lectionary mechanics, Ælfric encountered Matt 8:1–13 as part of a cluster of stories, all recounting the first manifestations of God and divine power in the person of Jesus Christ. This liturgical context pushes to the forefront the notions of manifestation and physical incarnation, and Ælfric follows these leads.

In his various English discussions of the seasons of the liturgical year, Ælfric uses the Old English term "Swutlode" to refer to Epiphany; this is a direct translation of the Greek term as the root "+swutl-" means "manifest." It is therefore no accident that forms of this root appear eight times throughout this homily. Although Ælfric not infrequently uses words from this root, its occurrences are higher on the average in two homilies: the homily for Epiphany itself and this text. As a result, the season has helped determine not only a theme of the homily (manifestation), but has shaped Ælfric's choice of words as well.

⁶⁹⁵ Note that this verse explicitly collects themes laid out in the prologue—the sign "revealed his glory and his disciples believed in him" (Ibid.)

The liturgical texts appointed for this time both ground Ælfric's main moral/spiritual interpretation and reveal another theme in the homily, a latent one that Ælfric brought in from his sources. He retained it, but did not appreciably expand or draw further notice to it. When the homily is placed in relation to the liturgical propers, though, this theme appears.

The material that would be repeated throughout the following week matches Ælfric's main thrust. The morning Benedictus antiphon for the Third Sunday and the rest of the week that followed is essentially Matt 8:1-3: "But when Jesus had come down from the mountain, behold a leper coming worshiped him, saying: 'Lord, if you wish, you can cleanse me. And extending his hand he touched him saying: 'I wish, be made clean." The liturgical use of this text again focuses interpretive weight on this verse that describes the physical action of Christ. The healing is implied but not stated in the text; rather the text describes Jesus receiving the leper's request and touching him. The meaning and significance of the actions are left open. The evening Magnificat antiphon from Matt 8:12: "Many shall come from the east and west, and recline with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven"697 serves as an exhortation to join the company coming from east and west and complements the Magnificat's own themes of eschatological reversal. The collect for the occasion, repeated in the weekly masses, directly relates to the Gospel text as well: "Almighty and eternal God, deliver us from our various infirmities and extend the right hand of your majesty to protect us. Through Jesus Christ our Lord..."698 It focuses attention on the spiritual meaning of the act of healing, placing the praying community in the place of those beseeching healing and is very specific about the means by which the healing occurs: "extend the right hand of your majesty..." This reference, in turn, leads to the second theme in the liturgical materials.

⁶⁹⁶ CAO 1985: Cum autem descendisset Iesus de monte, ecce leprosus veniens adorabat eum, dicens: Domine, si vis, potes me mundare. Et extendens manum, tetigit eum dicens: Volo, mundare.

⁶⁹⁷ CAO 3832: Multi ab Oriente et Occidente venient, et recumbent cum Abraham, Isaac et Iacob in regno caelorum.

⁶⁹⁸ Item 426. Omnipotens sempiterne dues, infirmitatem nostrum propitious respice, atque ad protegendum nos dexteram tuae maiestatis extende. Per. Orchard, Leofric Missal, 117.

The Offertory in particular focuses upon the image of the right hand: "The right hand of the Lord has exerted power; the right hand of the Lord has exalted me. I shall not die but live, and I will recount the works of God" (VgPs 117:16, 17).699 The Introit and Alleluia both draw on Ps 96 which connects the notion of God's kingly rule and the manifestation of God's glory to his presence on the earth: "The Lord reigns; let the earth rejoice, let many islands be glad" (VgPs 96:1).700 The Communion cites an otherwise unconnected phrase from Luke 4:22: "All marveled at this, which proceeded from the mouth of God" that takes on a new meaning when placed in relation to the healing word spoken by Jesus in the second half of the Gospel.

Haymo's homily on Matt 8:1–13 contains a doctrinal discussion of the power of Jesus in relation to the boundaries of the Incarnation and the literal and spiritual meaning of the healing power of the hand of Jesus. Haymo essentially argues that the image of the hand (or right hand) is a metaphor for God's might—Jesus' might—and that the distance healing of the centurion's servant demonstrates the continued omnipresence of Jesus while maintaining the localized presence required by the Incarnation.⁷⁰² Godden notes that these are the aspects of Haymo that Ælfric borrows most, not taking up Haymo's other major theme contrasting Jews and gentiles.⁷⁰³

Taking these liturgical sources back to Ælfric's homily, a deeper level of meaning emerges that had previously been overshadowed by Ælfric's attention to the moral meaning. Ælfric and his sources notice the unusual contrast between the first two miracle stories: that Jesus touches in the first yet heals from a great distance in the second. The juxtaposition of

_

⁶⁹⁹ Dextera Domini fecit virtutem: dextera Domini exaltavit me. Non moriar, sed vivam et narrabo opera Domini. This is the offertory in the majority of sources in Hesbert's Antiphonarium Missarum Sextuplex and in the Loefric Missal. (N.b.: the Leofric Missal displaces the Epiphany materials by one Sunday so this offertory appears with the usual gradual propers and Gospel for the 4th Sunday after Epiphany rather than the Third.)

⁷⁰⁰ Dominus regnavit, exsultet terra: laetentur insulae multae. See Hesbert and the Leofric Missal.

⁷⁰¹ Mirabantur omnes de his, quae procedebant de ore Dei. See Hesbert and the Leofric Missal.

⁷⁰² Though Ælfric puts up no red flags, Haymo seems on dangerous ground here doctrinally; this view of the omnipresence of Jesus' divinity and the localization of his humanity seems rather Nestorian, crossing the bounds of the Chalcedonian understanding of the two natures of Christ.

⁷⁰³ Godden, Commentary, 60.

the two miracles becomes a two-step argument concerning the nature of Christ's healing power. The first miracle emphasizes the bodily presence of Christ and the salutary nature of his touch. Ælfric—in line with the collect—connects the literal events of the touch and the healing with the spiritual realities of healing made possible through the Incarnation:

Mightily, Jesus could have cleansed [the leper] with his word, but he touched him: thus he manifested (geswutelode) that his touch is exceedingly saving to the faithful. ... His hand signifies his might and his Incarnation.⁷⁰⁴ Just as Christ healed the leper by touching him with his hands, so he redeemed us from our souls' sins by taking our flesh just as the prophet Isaiah said: 'Truly he himself carried our infirmities and he himself bore our afflictions.'⁷⁰⁵

Thus, the Incarnation enables Christ to redeem humanity and grants him the touch that heals both body and soul. The second step explores the issue of the presence of Christ and how the healing reveals truths about the mode of Christ's presence even during the Incarnation.

The doctrinal aspects of the second miracle are placed within the story's frame by attributing them to the centurion's perceptive wisdom: "[the centurion] had great wisdom when he understood that Christ is present (andwerd) everywhere through his divinity when he went bodily (lichamlice) and visibly among men." The terms "presence" (andwerd) and "bodily" (lichamlice) are closely connected here in a manner that will occur again in the homily. Their relation is the issue at stake: must Christ—and his healing right hand—be bodily present in order to be truly present? Ælfric's answer is that the second miracle provides a negative answer. The healing power of the word demonstrates that Christ's healing right hand is independent of his bodily location.

⁷⁰⁴ Literally, "fleshliness" (flæsclinysse) This is linguistically paralleled by Ælfric's use of "taking our flesh" (anfenge ure flæsces) in the Isaiah quotation below.

⁷⁰⁵ Mihtiglice he mihte mid his worde hine geclænsian buton hrepunge: ac he geswutelode þæt his hrepung is swiðe halwende geleaffullum. His hand getacnað his mihte & his flæsclicnysse. Swa swa crist mid his handa hrepunge þone hreoflian gehælde: swa alysde he us fram ure sawla synnum þurh anfenge ures flæsces. swa swa se witega issaias cwæð. Soðlice he sylf ætbræd ure adlunga. & ure sarnyssa he sylf bær. Ll. 32-34, 49-53.

The two terms occur again in Ælfric's comparison of the Johannine parallel but here the doctrinal meaning is suppressed in favor of the moral:

The Lord, though invited, would not go bodily (lichamlice) to the king's unhealthy son but not present (unandwerd) healed him with his word. And yet, he was ready although uninvited to go bodily (lichamlice) with the centurion. He knew well that the king had more might than any centurion but the son of Almighty God manifested (geswutlode) with this deed that we should not honor the rich for their riches but for their human nature nor should we scorn the poor for their poverty but should honor God's likeness in them. The humble son of God was ready to go to the servant with his presence (andwerdnyss) yet he healed the prince with his command. Concerning this the prophet said: "The exalted Lord observes the humble, and he knows the haughty from afar."

In essence, this interpretation seems to overturn the first, denying Christ's presence to the prince. The moral meaning, then, is drawn from the literal level; Christ could have healed the leper, the centurion's servant, or the prince whether present or absent, but deployed his bodily presence to give an example to be followed on the treatment of rich and poor. The humility manifested in the bodily example should be imitated, supernatural capabilities aside.

The doctrinal focus upon presence also clarifies an otherwise confusing comparison between the centurion and the two sisters Mary and Martha. In treating Jesus' comment on dæde þæt we ne sceolon þa rican for heora ricetere wurðian: ac for menniscum gecynde. Ne we ne sceolon þa wanspedigan for heora hafenleaste forseon: ac we sceolon godes anlicnysse on him wurþian. Se eadmoda godes sunu wæs gearo to geneosigenne þone þeowan mid his andwerdnysse: & he gehælde þone æðeling mid his hæse. Be þam cwæð se witega. Se healica drihten sceawað þa eadmodan. & þa modigan feorran oncnæwð. Ll. 127-38.

⁷⁰⁶ Drihten nolde gelaðod lichamlice siþian to þæs cyninges untruman bearne: ac unandwerd mid his worde hine gehælde. & he wæs gearo ungelaðod to siþigenne lichamlice mid þam hundredes ealldre. Wel wat gehwa þæt cyning hæfð maran mihte. þonne ænig hun dredes ealdor: ac se ælmihtiga godes sunu geswutelode mid bære

the surpassing greatness of the centurion's faith above all of the Jews of his generation, Ælfric mentions Mary and Martha. By placing the reference here, Ælfric clearly intends his hearers to see how they are surpassed by the centurion's witness but no explanation is given as to how this occurs: "Mary and Martha were two sisters exceedingly faithful to God; they said to Christ: 'Lord, if you had been present (andwerd) here, our brother would not have departed.' This thane [the centurion] said to Christ, 'Say the word and my servant will be healed…" All three characters are identified as having powerful faith—the centurion having "great faith" (micelum geleafan), ⁷⁰⁷ and Mary and Martha are "exceedingly faithful" (swipe belyfede). ⁷⁰⁸ The comparisons appear positive; there does not seem to be a defect in their faith. Viewed from the liturgical emphasis on presence, though, it appears that the sisters' defect was not in their faith per se but in their understanding of the omnipresence of Christ. They failed to perceive, as the centurion, had that Christ was present even when not there bodily.

The doctrinal focus on the presence or absence of Christ in relation to the bodily presence of the man Jesus diminishes if not effectively bypassing altogether the centurion's statement on authority. Because Ælfric is attempting to communicate Christ's divine presence accomplishing the healing, he makes no reference to angelic or supernatural mediators through whom Jesus accomplishes healing. While Anglo-Saxon Christians firmly believed in the role of supernatural beings causing illness as shown by the numerous references to and charms against elf-shot in the healing manuals, Ælfric gives no hint at all that that supernatural beings outside of the Trinity are involved in the distance healings.

Discussion

⁷⁰⁷ Ll. 105 and 106.

⁷⁰⁸ Ll. 147-9.

⁷⁰⁹ Smaragdus cites two unatttributed presumably patristic passages that both discuss the angelic beings located in Jesus' control in the divine chain of command. Ælfric is not ignorant of this reading, rather, he chooses to suppress it.

⁷¹⁰ See Karen L. Jolly, Popular Religion in Late Saxon England: Elf Charms in Context (Chapel Hill/London: University of North Carolina Press, 1996) and Richard S. Nokes and Kathryn Laity, editors, Curing Elf-shot and Other Mysterious Maladies: New Scholarship on Old English Charms. (University Park, Penn.: Penn State University Press, 2009).

The modern commentaries emphasize the marginal nature of the individuals healed in this pericope; Ælfric makes no reference to this common characteristic. If anything, he seems to flatten the distinction between Jew and Gentile, regarding the centurion socially equivalent to a minor secular lord of his own day and therefore a person of social power and influence rather than an outsider. Luz contends in his brief survey of the history of interpretation of the healing of the leper that the social aspect of the text has been missing until recent times: "The leper is a type of the believer who comes to Christ and receives a gift from him. As a rule his gift was understood figuratively; one is freed from 'spiritual leprosy,' from mortal sin. Seldom was the physical and social dimension of Christ's help taken seriously." Ælfric's interpretation confirms the truth of the first part of Luz's statement, but calls into question the second.

Ælfric's discussion of the healing of the leper does make the ready turn to a spiritualizing interpretation. However, it holds the spiritual meaning in tension with the literal meaning of the passage, placing the two in parallel: "Just as Christ healed the leper by touching [him] with his hands, so he redeemed us from the offenses of our souls by taking on our flesh." The spiritual truth does not cancel out the literal truth though Ælfric clearly considers the spiritual to be of more relevance to his congregation.

Ælfric refutes Luz with his attention to the social dimensions of the text. Ælfric offers his hearers a brief recap of the levitical laws concerning leprosy that includes the social penalties of the sickness. Furthermore, Ælfric went beyond speaking of the text as text and offered a concrete discussion of how the text was to be acted out in the community of his day by reference to specific ecclesial practices embodying Christ's healing inclusion.

The patristic and early medieval church took sin seriously. The consequence of mortal sin was eternal damnation in the torments of hell—torments described frequently and ⁷¹¹ Luz, Matthew 8-20, 2.7.

⁷¹² Swa swa crist mid his handa hrepunge þone hreoflian gehælde: swa alysde he us fram ure sawla synnum þurh anfenge ures flæsces. Ll. 50-52.

in laborious detail by the anonymous Old English homilies as well as more orthodox material. The church did not regard sin solely as a problem for the individual sinner. The presence of unrepentant sinners within the community threatened the whole community's eschatological standing. An insufficient response on the part of the church authorities risked the spread of sinful behavior. As early as 1 Cor⁷¹³ and Matthew's own gospel,⁷¹⁴ excommunication was the ultimate means of discipline if other methods failed.

Godden notes that Ælfric's connection of "sick sheep" to 1 Cor 5:13 suggests that his discussion of excommunication is filtered through the Rule of Benedict where the last resort is expulsion: "For the Apostle says: Banish the evil one from your midst (1 Cor 5:13); and again, If the unbeliever departs, let him depart (1 Cor 7:15), lest one diseased sheep infect the whole flock."⁷¹⁵ Intentional communities cannot survive without clear methods of discipline—and monasteries are no exception. Benedict spends seven chapters specifically on excommunication, what faults deserve it and how it should be handled.

When severe offenses occur in the monastery, the process laid out in Matt 18:15–17 is used; if no reconciliation occurs, the offender is excommunicated. There are two degrees of monastic excommunication, and both are fundamentally social. For less serious faults, offenders participate in the community's liturgical life and may lead nothing, but are excluded from the common meal eating afterward, alone. For severe faults, offenders are excluded from both the community's liturgical life—including Mass and reception of the Eucharist—as well as the common meal. Furthermore, all contact is cut off: the monastics must work and eat alone and receive no blessings, nor is the food of offenders blessed. Anyone contacting offenders without permission is likewise excommunicated. The only

⁷¹³ 1 Cor 5: 1–13.

⁷¹⁴ Matt 18:15–17.

⁷¹⁵ RB 28.6-7.

⁷¹⁶ RB 23.

⁷¹⁷ RB 24

⁷¹⁸ RB 25.

⁷¹⁹ RB 26.

human contact allowed by the Rule is from the abbot/abbess or seniors when they attempt to persuade offenders to reform their ways.⁷²⁰ If neither remonstrations nor beatings prove effective, offenders are expelled from the community.⁷²¹ Those expelled who show sufficient contrition may be received back twice but a third expulsion is final.⁷²²

Similarly, the excommunication of a layperson cut them off from Christian fellowship. The rest of the community was not to associate with them and they could not receive the sacraments or a Christian burial thus ensuring their eternal damnation. According to the official canons of the Western Church, excommunicates could be reconciled with the church and community by becoming Penitents, a technical term denoting a class of people some of whom underwent public penitential acts for the rest of their life. This form of penance could only be undertaken once; there was no second chance. Although this form of penance was neither common nor popular after

In the early medieval period the practice of private auricular confession gained ground as an alternative to this merciless process. A form known as "tariff penance" arose in Celtic monastic communities and spread from the British Isles to the continent. Rooted in monastic ideals, particularly Cassian's Institutes on the vices and their contrary remedies, sinners could confess their faults, receive a penance (which usually involved fasting for set periods), then priestly absolution.

While the rabbis compared the social consequences of leprosy to death, early medieval theologians compared the state of mortal sin (including excommunication) to both leprosy and death.⁷²⁴ Its reversal in auricular confession was thus equivalent to miraculous

⁷²¹ RB 28.

⁷²⁰ RB 27.

⁷²² RB 29

⁷²³ While popular in this period, auricular confession did not gain official standing in the western church until it was mandated by the bull Omnis utriusque sexus promulgated by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215.

⁷²⁴ Indeed, the 7th century Penitential of Cummean begins with this statement: "Here begins the prologue on the medicine for the salvation of souls." (Oliver Davies, Celtic Spirituality (Classics of Western Spirituality; N.Y., N.Y.: Paulist, 1999, 230)). The Penetiential is in Davies, Celtic Spirituality, 230-245.

healing and resurrection: the two proof-texts with which it was consistently connected are the healing of the leper and the resurrection of Lazarus.⁷²⁵

While Luz contends that the leprosy was spiritualized and the social aspects of this text were therefore overlooked by early interpreters, I would contend that the spiritualization of leprosy and the comparison of confession to the miraculous cure not only capture the concept of the inclusive power of Christ's healing but literally enact it within the community. Through sacramental absolution those excluded by their sinful behavior are welcomed back into the community; the repentant sinner, like the healed leper, is reintegrated within the social order.

_

⁷²⁵ See Peter Lombard's foundational treatment in Sententiarum Libri Quatuor 3.18.1.

MATTHEW 25:1–13

Introduction

Matthew 25:1-13 is a parabolic narrative. That is, it appears as a parable in the midst of parables. Its introductory formula is common to several of Matthew's parables of the kingdom, ⁷²⁶ and like them, a narrative follows. However, the narrative is more extended than usual, raising the question whether the passage is properly a parable, an allegory, or some blend of the two.

This parable is unique to Matthew—Eusebius assigns it to canon X. Aland notes some minor thematic parallels between the parable and Mark 13:33-37 and Luke 12:35-38; 13:25-28. The final verse of the parable shares a number of textual and thematic parallels to other verses within this discourse, most notably Matt 24:42 but also 24:50.

Modern Interpreters

Luz

Luz locates the parable of the virgins as "the third watchfulness parable" that is linked to the preceding parables by a set of catchwords—"wise," "delay," "master/Lord". The Overall, he posits a fairly complicated structure to make sense of all of the elements of the parable; it "follows the classical three steps of a dramatic narrative" and also contains a title and an ending refrain. Thus, we have the title in v. 1, background exposition in vv. 2-5, the conflict appears in vv. 6-9, and the denouement encompasses vv. 10-12. Luz refers to v. 13 simply as "a refrainlike call to watch" and passes over how or if this verse is integrated with the larger whole.

Luz devotes a substantive section of his treatment to the source of the text. He attacks the question by considering whether or not the narrative is culturally plausible, based on a knowledge of first century marriage customs, apart from any metaphorical or allegorical meaning. The two central points that he must explain are, where the virgins are sleeping, and what the "lamps" are, where they are, and whether they are ignited while the virgins sleep; these are the elements that seem least plausible (for what sort of women fall asleep—outside—with lit oil lamps?). After making a compelling argument that the λαμπάδης were lantern torches rather than simply oil lamps⁷²⁹ and suggesting that the virgins were inside rather than outside when the call comes he concludes that v. 1 is a title. In light of these interpretations, he decides that this narrative is a plausible story reflecting ancient Palestinian life and could indeed go back to Jesus rather than necessarily being a creation of the early church.

⁷²⁶ Matt 13:24, 31, 33, 44, 45, 47; 18:23; 20:1; 22:2.

⁷²⁷ Luz, Matthew 21-28, 227.

⁷²⁸ Ibid.

As a result, Luz offers three interpretations: one for the parable as told by Jesus, another for the parable as told by the church, and the third as Matthew understood it. The first is rather simple and straightforward; Luz believes that Jesus' original parable had no reference to the Parousia, but was about recognizing the "kairos of joy" in the presence of Jesus. At the second level, however, the bridegroom was no longer the earthly Jesus but the exalted Jesus, and the delay of the bridegroom is now related to the delay of the Parousia. The third level leads into Luz's verse-by-verse exposition. He moves briskly, covering the twelve verses in just two and a half pages, utilizing a reader-response perspective that envisions how Matthew's readers understand the tragic drama unfolding before them and attending to how Matthew creates tension, introduces reversals, and (in v. 11) shifts from bridegroom to Son of Man-World Judge. At this point he chooses to take the same tack as he sees Matthew taking, and leaves the meaning of the story and the significance of the oil open.

While Luz typically includes a "History of Interpretation" section, in this case he launches into a (comparatively) lengthy eleven-page examination of the church's use of this text, complete with a manuscript illumination and three photographs of sculptures that depict the parable. In defense of this extreme treatment, he notes that "no parable of Jesus was painted or portrayed in the plastic arts as frequently" and examines the interpretations embedded within medieval artistic depictions of the parable. Following his usual method he breaks the potential meanings into general categories, identifying five:

⁷²⁹ Luz, Matthew 21-28, 228-230.

- The spiritual interpretation in terms of the individual. This is a predominantly early and Alexandrian reading where the virgins are the senses that must be kept unstained from evil. It is non-eschatological, and Origen is the chief exemplar.⁷³⁰
- 2. The ecclesiastical eschatological interpretation. These interpretations see the virgins as representative of individual Christians who live their lives, die, then appear at the Great Judgment. The virgins function in two ways in this strand:⁷³¹
 - a. Wise women as positive models. Especially in the Eastern Church, the wise virgins were models for Christian female ascetics. Bride mysticism may be a component of this interpretation as well. Western medieval illustrations also teach this perspective and the parable becomes an encouragement to virginity.
 - b. Preaching of penitence. This interpretation focuses on the foolish virgins as negative models; Luz refers to both medieval plays featuring the virgins but also to the inclusion of the virgins into the depictions of the last judgment carved into high medieval cathedrals.
- Parenetic interpretations. Parenetic readings were the most common, though, and these fall into three types:⁷³²
 - a. The classic Catholic interpretation. Here the lamps of the virgins represent faith, the oil represents good works.

_

⁷³⁰ Luz, Matthew 21-28, 235-236.

⁷³¹ Luz, Matthew 21-28, 236-240.

⁷³² Luz, Matthew 21-28, 240-242.

- b. The Augustinian type. This is focused on the believer's attitude. The lamps refer to faith; as for the oil, "The information that Augustine and his followers give is somewhat unclear." 733 The main point is the attitude or motive that produces the good works.
- c. The anti-ascetic type. John Chrysostom and others deny that asceticism alone will get one into the banquet, rather the crucial oil is "human kindness, alms, aid to the needy."⁷³⁴
- d. The pictorial interpretations. In the Gothic style, many depictions of the foolish virgins present them in overly elaborate clothing suggesting that wasteful and immoral behavior is the key to their guilt.
- 4. Interpretations with salvation history tendencies. Starting with Jerome, some saw the wise virgins as Christians or representatives of the Church and the foolish as Jews or representatives of the Synagogue. This interpretation also appears in some of the Gothic cathedral carvings.⁷³⁵
- 5. Matthew 25:1-13 in the confessional conflict. In the Reformation and post-Reformation periods, the oil was either faith or the Holy Spirit. This interpretation was a conscious reversal of the classic Catholic parenetic interpretation, insisting that works without faith are worthless.⁷³⁶

Surveying all of these options, Luz dismisses interpretations 1 and 4 as being furthest from the original meaning of the text. He approves the bride mysticism of number 2 as legitimately within the bounds of the text. While number 5 has roots in Paul, it contradicts ⁷³³ Luz, Matthew 21-28, 242. The truth of this comment will become quite clear in the following modern and medieval interpretations. However, Luz makes matters more complicated than he should have as he attempts to harmonize Augustine's two major treatments into a single reading. In my view, Augustine actually gives two completely different readings, one of which was taken up by the tradition as will be discussed later in Ælfric's treatment of the text.

_

⁷³⁴ Ibid.

⁷³⁵ Luz, Matthew 21-28, 242-243.

⁷³⁶ Luz, Matthew 21-28, 243.

the emphases of the Matthean text. Numbers 3b and 3c with their emphasis on love are "not far removed" from the original intent.⁷³⁷ Luz finds the emphasis on virginity in 2a and on judgment in 2b as quite problematic.

Luz summarizes the parable as parenesis for the church. "Here the readers learn that not everyone who is called to the wedding of the bridegroom will actually share in it." The final note on watching as a call to constant obedience to the will of the Father so that believers are fully prepared and need not worry even if they do sleep; the timing of the Parousia is immaterial if one is always prepared for it. However, Luz concludes his summary with a critical reflection, drawing on Kazantzakis's treatment of the parable in The Last Temptation of Christ. With Kazantzakis, Luz greatly prefers an alternate ending where the doors are thrown open and all—even the foolish and unprepared—are let into the feast.

Davies and Allison

Structurally, Davies and Allison locates the parable of the virgins within the context of the final discourse of Jesus within Matthew (Matt 24:36–25:30), a discourse treated under the heading "Eschatological Vigilance."⁷³⁹ The key theme of the discourse is presented in its initial verse, Matt 24:36: "Its declaration of eschatological ignorance grounds the entire section: one must be ever prepared for what may come at any time."⁷⁴⁰ The immediate context is a set of three parables that have much in common: "All three concern the delay of the Parousia, preparedness for the end, and recompense at the great assize; and in each the concluding emphasis is upon those who suffer punishment (24.50–1; 25.10–12, 24–30)."⁷⁴¹

Following several influential commentators including Gnilka, Kümmel, Tärrech and Manson, they conclude that "a pre-Matthean parable lies behind 24.1b, 3–10b. We attribute ⁷³⁷ Luz, Matthew 21-28, 244.

⁷³⁸ Ibid.

⁷³⁹ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.374.

⁷⁴⁰ Ibid.

⁷⁴¹ Ibid.

it to Jesus who taught that although the precise date of God's coming cannot be predicted (cf. v. 5), the present is the time of preparation for its joyful advent."⁷⁴² Matthew has adapted the parable and "thoroughly assimilated [it] to its present context: its major themes are all reflected in the surrounding material."⁷⁴³ These themes are: Division into two groups, Delay of the Parousia, Ignorance of the hour, suddenness of the end, Necessity to watch, and Requirement of prudence.⁷⁴⁴ The language and style is also distinctively Matthean.⁷⁴⁵

Davies and Allison explain the text's broad meaning succinctly before moving into their phrase-by-phrase analysis; they do so with a citation from Jeremias's work on parables:

Matthew's text is plainly 'an allegory of the Parousia of Christ, the heavenly bridegroom: the Ten Virgins are the expectant Christian community, the "tarrying" of the bridegroom(v. 5) is the postponement of the Parousia, his sudden coming (v. 6) is the unexpected incidence of the Parousia, the stern rejection of the foolish virgins (v.11) is the final Judgement'. [Jeremias, Parables, p.51]

The parable and application teach three simple lessons, the first indicated by the behaviour of the bridegroom, the second by the behaviour of the wise virgins, and the third by the behaviour of the foolish virgins. The bridegroom delays and comes at an unforeseen time, which circumstances entails yet again that no one knows the day or hour of the Son of man's Parousia. The wise virgins, who stand for faithful disciples, reveal that religious prudence will gain eschatological reward. The foolish virgins, who stand for unfaithful disciples, reveal that religious failure will suffer eschatological punishment.⁷⁴⁶

101a.

⁷⁴² Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.393-4.

⁷⁴³ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.394.

⁷⁴⁴ Ibid.

⁷⁴⁵ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.375.

⁷⁴⁶ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.392.

Thus they see the pericope as both a parable and an allegory with the caveat that not "every detail has an allegorical meaning." There is overlap between the two categories that this text occupies. They also call attention to points where the author slips, as at the end. The repetition of "Lord" is "inappropriate when spoken to the groom; Jesus as eschatological Lord is clearly in Matthew's mind rather than a man getting married. Furthermore the formula "truly, I say to you" is also "out of place in a bridegroom's mouth but not in the mouth of the Son of man." As their analysis will bear out, though, they prefer to stay on the side of parable and move to the level of allegory only when necessary.

For interpretive resources, Davies and Allison return to earlier usages in Matthew. In particular, they highlight sections of the Sermon on the Mount (5:15–16; 7:24–27),⁷⁵⁰ the parable of the wedding feast/garment (22:11–14),⁷⁵¹ and earlier sections of the eschatological discourse (24:23–43).⁷⁵² The main detail that they discuss aside from those identified in the passage quoted above is discussion about the meaning of "the lamp (and/or its fuel)"⁷⁵³ two objects which they take together. Drawing on the earlier Matthean parallels, they offer a tentative suggestion:

In view of 5.15–16 and the parallels with 7.24–7 and 22.11–14 (where the absence of a wedding garment must⁷⁵⁴ symbolize the absence of good deeds), one wonders whether Matthew did not identify the lamp (and/or its fuel) as a symbol of good works. Certainly the

47

⁷⁴⁷ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.392, n. 130.

⁷⁴⁸ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.400.

⁷⁴⁹ Thid

⁷⁵⁰ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.396-7, 400. Interestingly, aside from the single bare citation of "Compare 7.23" in the discussion of the end of v. 12 (401), 7:21–23 is not mentioned.

⁷⁵¹ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.396-7, 389

⁷⁵² Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.398,399, 400, 401.

⁷⁵³ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.397.

⁷⁵⁴ Not all interpreters are of this opinion; Luther understood the garment as faith while Gregory saw it as love—reminiscent of their interpretations of the oil. I would not be surprised to find that most interpreters interpret the garment and the oil as the same thing.

next parable, that of the talents, has to do with good deeds, and Jewish sources use both lamp and oil as metaphors of the law and virtue. But we are uncertain.⁷⁵⁵

A footnote after "good works" offers a number of interpretations from the patristic authors through the present day; it concludes with two that underscore an agnosticism towards any secure identification: "Contrast Calvin ad loc: 'There is great ingenuity over the lanterns, the vessels, the oil: the plain and natural answer is that keen enthusiasm for a short term is not enough...'. The great number of differing opinions led A. B. Bruce, The Parabolic Teaching of Jesus, London, 1882, p. 502, to remark: the oil is 'anything you please'."⁷⁵⁶

Throughout the footnotes Davies and Allison maintain a running conversation with Augustine's Sermo 93. They note his identification of the oil as love in note 159;757 mention "[p]atristic tradition" including Augustine on the identification of sleep with death, without approving or refuting it, in note 164; mention in a question his connection of the cry at midnight with the trumpet of 24:31, in note 167; disagree with his identification of v. 9 as reproach, in note 173. This running engagement with a patristic source is relatively unusual for this commentary, and no other pre-modern source is followed this closely, although Calvin is mentioned multiple times as well. Thus while modern commentators form the major conversation partners for the commentary, in this section that they have identified as allegorical, they engage pre-modern sources more than usual.

Pointing toward the conclusion of the theme of the discourse as well as the parable, Davies and Allison propose by citing Manson that: "[i]t may be suggested that the original and essential point of the story is that the ten virgins have one task and one only, to be ready with lamps burning brightly when the bridegroom appears' [Manson, Sayings, 243]."⁷⁵⁸

⁷⁵⁵ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.396-7.

⁷⁵⁶ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.397, n. 159.

⁷⁵⁷ They also note his alternate identification of the oil with joy in De Div Quaest. 83 without citing it.

⁷⁵⁸ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.400 quoting from T. W. Manson, The Sayings of Jesus (London: SCM, 1949).

Rounding out the editorial conclusion of v. 13, they note the ambiguous note on which the text ends. They end with some ambiguity as well:

The call to wakefulness—a conflation of 24.36, 42, and 50—has been thought odd given that even the five wise virgins fell asleep (v. 5). But γρηγορεῖτε may mean only 'be prepared!' And in any case the imperative is addressed to the reader, not the foolish virgins. What wakefulness precisely consists in—doing the will of God?—is here left unsaid, although it plainly involves looking to the future.⁷⁵⁹

Due to the ambiguity surrounding the lamps, the oil, and the parable's conclusion, they treat the three parables as a unit and stay on the level of the general. Matthew is concerned about spiritual lethargy in the face of the delay of the Parousia and exhorts his readers to moral preparation lest they be caught unaware.⁷⁶⁰

Eugene Boring

After noting that the parable is a continuation of the judgment discourse, Boring blends the question of original authorship (noting that scholars have proposed Jesus, the early church [presumably pre-Matthean], or Matthew) with the question of form: is this a parable or an allegory? Authorship is presumably dependent upon the solution of the form. Boring draws a dichotomous distinction between the two: "The key issue whether the details are realistic (parable) or seem contrived to fit the theological meaning (allegory)." Noting that "the story itself is unclear on the procedures of the wedding celebration," that "details

⁷⁵⁹ Davies and Allison, Matthew, 3.401.

⁷⁶⁰ Ibid.

⁷⁶¹ Boring, "Matthew," 449.

⁷⁶² Ibid. In earlier discussions on parables prefacing Matthew 13 and on Matthew's notion of the Kingdom in Matthew 12, Boring has expressed a general distaste for allegorical interpretation of parables ("Such an interpretation offers fertile ground for the preacher's imagination, but has little to do with the text of the Bible." [Boring, "Matthew, 298]) and has observed that "...Matthew sometimes misses the parabolic character of Jesus' message..." (Boring, "Matthew," 294). These judgments seem to play a role in his conflation of form and authorship and with his findings.

⁷⁶³ Ibid.

within the present story seem inherently unrealistic"⁷⁶⁴ like the midnight arrival and probability of oil shops open at that hour, and identifying numerous thoroughly Matthean themes, Boring concludes that "it seems likely that the story is an allegory constructed by Matthew to further illustrate and emphasize the theme of being ready for the coming of the Lord, despite the apparent delay."⁷⁶⁵ Having identified the story as an allegory, Boring treats it with dispatch, presenting a list of element identifications, providing a summarizing paragraph on the allegory, then a summarizing paragraph on the conclusion, then a modern appropriation in his Reflections section.

Boring lines up the five key elements, italicizes them, and heads five successive paragraphs with them, identifying each concisely with little discussion and no presentation of alternatives. The bridegroom "is Jesus at his eschatological advent."⁷⁶⁶ The bridesmaids "represent the church, the present corpus mixtum that will be sorted out at the parousia."⁷⁶⁷ The bridegroom's delay is the delay of the parousia while the bridegroom's arrival "is the parousia."⁷⁶⁸ The oil "or rather having oil, represents what will count at the parousia: deeds of love and mercy in obedience with the Great Commandment (25:31–46)."⁷⁶⁰ The identifications that he provides are broadly traditional, falling in line with many modern commentators⁷⁷⁰ as well as ancient, once again corresponding with Augustine's identifications in Sermo 93. The only difference is that Augustine understands the oil a little differently based on his analysis of the lamps; Boring does not mention the lamps nor does he take up why all ten started with lamps and oil. In his summary and Reflections, however, he indicates that foolish began with works of mercy and love but did not persevere in them as the wise did. He does not mention 24:12, but it seems implicit in his explanation.

⁷⁶⁴ Boring, "Matthew," 450.

⁷⁶⁵ Ibid.

⁷⁶⁶ Ibid.

⁷⁶⁷ Ibid.

⁷⁶⁸ Ibid.

⁷⁶⁹ Ibid. The emphasis is in the original.

⁷⁷⁰ Though not all, of course; as noted above, Davies and Allison reject the notion that the church is the corpus mixtum.

Boring draws on the surrounding discourse and on the Sermon on the Mount for his identifications. Rather than referring to individual verses within the Sermon on the Mount and constructing a number of oblique connections, however, Boring is quite explicit about them, devoting his post-interpretation paragraph to a direct connection with Matt 5–7:

The futile attempt to buy oil after the arrival of the bridegroom, though historically unrealistic, shows the futility of trying to prepare when it is too late. As in other Matthean scenes, there are finally only two groups: those who are ready and those who are not. As in the Sermon on the Mount, Matthew is not averse to closing on a negative note, with those who say "Lord, Lord" being excluded if they do not have the corresponding deeds of discipleship (cf. 7:21–27). The Sermon on the Mount has much more in common with the "eschatological discourse" than is generally noticed by those who are fascinated only by the one or the other. Both are thoroughly Christological; both are thoroughly eschatological; both are thoroughly committed to the conviction that having the right confession without the corresponding life is ultimately disastrous.⁷⁷¹

The connection that he makes on literary and thematic grounds is turned to the modern situation in a sizable section of his Reflections:

Readiness in Matthew is, of course, living the life of the kingdom, living the quality of life described in the Sermon on the Mount. Many can do this for a short while; but when the kingdom is delayed, the problems arise. Being a peacemaker for a day is not as demanding as being a peacemaker year after year when the hostility breaks out again and again, and the bridegroom is delayed. Being merciful for an evening can be pleasant; being merciful for a lifetime, when the groom is delayed, requires preparedness.

⁷⁷¹ Boring, "Matthew," 450.

At the beginning of the life of faith, you cannot really tell the followers of Jesus apart. They all have lamps; they are all excited about the wedding; they all know how to sing, "Lord, lord." Deep into the night, when we spot some persons attempting in vain to fan a dying flame to life, we begin to distinguish wisdom from foolishness.

The meaning of this pericope is, for Boring, inextricably tied to the Sermon on the Mount. His Reflections upon the Judgment Discourse as a whole not only acknowledge this but use it a means for redirecting a potential over-emphasis on the bizarre eschatological elements back to a central Matthean focus on discipleship:

Matthew 24 is not an eschatological discourse that presents Matthew's or Jesus' doctrine of the end, but is part of chaps. 23–25, whose aim is pastoral care and encouragement. A synopsis will show that by incorporating the "little apocalypse" of Mark 13 into this larger framework, Matthew (affirms but) reduces the significance of apocalyptic per se, subordinating it to other, more directly pastoral, forms of discourse. What Matthew presents, and what is to be preached from these texts, is judgment and warnings on Christian discipleship oriented towards the eschatological victory of the kingdom of God, represented in Christ.

Matthean eschatology is fundamentally then not about the end and its coming but is rather an impetus for authentic discipleship. This pericope, despite Boring's misgivings about its form, is an illustration of this fundamental theme.

Douglas Hare

Hare treats the parable within the broader context of the apocalyptic teaching of Matt 24:1–25:46 which he entitles "The Discourse About the Messiah's Glorious Coming."⁷⁷² Its immediate context is within a parable collection in Matt 24:45–25:30, "Three Parables About Faithful Waiting" which are specifically addressed to three groups of Christians concerning three different kinds of accountability. The first parable, the parable of the slave left in charge (Matt 24:45–51), is directed to church leaders. The third parable, the parable of the talents (Matt 25:14–30), is directed to those who have been given special gifts. This middle parable, the parable of the wise and foolish virgins (Matt 25:1–13) is directed to the rank-and-file Christians—everybody.

Hare states that the parable was intended by Matthew to be read as an allegory: "...certain details of the parable are allegorical for Matthew."⁷⁷⁴ He does not address the tradition history of the parable, refusing to speculate on its original author or transmission history. Rather, he engages the received text directly. Within the text, he finds a number of obvious identifications: the virgins are Christians, Jesus is the bridegroom, the bridegroom's delay is the delay of the parousia (though he avoids the technical term for the sake of his readers), the marriage feast is the life of the age to come, and the closed door is the last judgment.⁷⁷⁵

Other elements of the story are less clear, in particular: "the key element in the story—the extra oil that the wise virgins have and the foolish do not—since this is not a stock metaphor." Hare mentions Luther's suggestion of faith and anonymously puts forward Augustine's suggestion of love with his reference to Matt 24:12, but asserts: "The most popular suggestion is that Mathew regards the oil as standing for good works." Following the work of Susan Praeder, he rejects this option because good works do not burn

_

⁷⁷² Hare, Matthew, 273.

⁷⁷³ Hare, Matthew, 283. For his groupings to function, he does not recognize Matt 25:31–46, commonly referred to as the parable of the sheep and the goats, as a parable. Throughout its interpretation he mentions it only as a "passage" and applies it entirely to "pagans," denying that it speaks of the judgment of Christians.

⁷⁷⁴ Hare, Matthew, 284.

⁷⁷⁵ Ibid.

⁷⁷⁶ Ibid.

⁷⁷⁷ Hare, Matthew, 285. Regrettably, he does not mention any of the authors or interpreters who have suggested this option. Augustine, Gregory, and writers following them mentioned good works but identified them with the lamps rather than the oil.

out or are not consumed before the last judgment. He concludes, rather, that "It is better to take the oil not allegorically but parabolically. The main point of the story is that the foolish virgins are not ready when the great moment finally arrives." He then goes on to enumerate a list of passages in the gospel referring to various good works that Matthew may have understood as part of being ready for the moment.

Hare also disagrees with the interpretation of the virgins' sleep as death and the great cry as the general resurrection. He prefers to see the sleep as not allegorical, but "simply a narrative detail. He concludes his exposition with by reminding his readers, "Despite the attached command "Watch!" (v. 13), the sleeping of the foolish virgins is not the source of their problem, since the wise sleep also. Being watchful means being ready at all times, whether waking or sleeping." Although he does not state that the concluding verse has been incorrectly attached to the parable he implies it by his reinterpretation of the word "watch."

Thus, Hare presents a reading of the parable that both understands it as allegory but simultaneously refuses to acknowledge it as such. That is, he accepts the presence of certain allegorical elements, but denies that other elements—the major ones, in fact—are allegorical.

Ælfric's Interpretation

The Homily Proper

Ælfric's homily on Matthew 25:1–13 has a complicated, almost disorganized, structure that reveals his difficulties in negotiating this parable. Standing in continuity with the tradition, Ælfric understands the parable of the wise and foolish virgins to be an allegory elucidating one aspect of the final judgment. He does not read it as comprehensively describing the event but rather as an explanation why some who appear righteous will be rejected from the final consummation on the last day. As a result of this interpretive decision, much of the body of the homily is spent identifying the proper understanding of the elements in the parable. Combined with a typical verse-by-verse outline, the frequent glosses, interpretations, and supporting references result in a frenetic text lacking an effective flow. This is complicated by points when Ælfric returns in later verses to elements he had interpreted earlier and either expands or modifies his previous interpretation.

⁷⁷⁸ Ibid.

⁷⁷⁹ Ibid.

Ælfric's interpretive method follows standard patristic rules for interpretation—any truth presented obscurely in Scripture is necessarily explained openly somewhere else. Therefore the task of the interpreter is to correctly link the clear with the obscure, links most often established by common language. For the most part Ælfric follows these principles, demonstrating responsible medieval exegetical technique by citing the various passages from which he draws his interpretation either in Old English or in both Old English and Latin. Only a few times does he offer identifications not grounded by Scripture citation and these are the elements to which he returns later in the homily to ground scripturally.

The interpretation of the allegory is not haphazard but focuses around three particular blocks of Scripture—one that provides the general interpretive context and two that supply equivalencies for the particular elements. The contextualizing block is also the immediate context of the passage: Matthew's final apocalyptic discourse (Matt 24:1–25:46). While Ælfric makes limited direct reference to this section within the homily, its presence and relevance is assumed; there is not the least suggestion that this allegory could refer to anything other than the last judgment.

⁷⁸⁰ A representative example of this teaching is the view found throughout Augustine's De Doc. Chr. that "the more open places present themselves to hunger and the more obscure places may deter a disdainful attitude. Hardly anything may be found in these obscure places which is not found plainly said elsewhere" (Augustine, De Doc. Chr. 2.6.8. Augustine, On Christian Doctrine. D. W. Robertson, Jr., trans., (Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1958), 38).

⁷⁸¹ "When a figurative locution appears, the words of which it is composed will be seen to be derived from similar things or related to such things by association" (Augustine, De Doc. Chr. 3.25.34. Augustine, Christian Doctrine, 99.). While the wording is ambiguous, Augustine's own interpretive writings make abundantly clear that he means that the "similar things" mentioned here are words used in other passages of Scripture.

The meat of the interpretation is drawn from Matthew's Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5:1–7:27) and from a Pauline understanding of the last day centered around 1 Thess 4–5. The different blocks offer solutions to different portions of the allegory. The Sermon on the Mount material provides the overall meaning and therefore fills in details concerning the virgins and their accourtements while the Pauline materials serve to sketch the eschatological timeline.

The controlling Matthean texts that guide Ælfric's overall interpretation are Matt 6:1–8, 16–18; Matt 7:7, and Matt 7:21–22. The first section presents Jesus' teaching on good works and practices of piety that requires the proper internal disposition. Those who perform good works for the sake of human adulation have already received their reward and, in doing so, have forfeited their eschatological recompense. Ælfric explicitly cites the statement on rewards (Matt 6:2b and parallels) in both English and Latin:

Some men are so seduced by frivolous boasting that they do for the praise of men what they ought to do for the love of God; then they are foolish for they seek after the frivolous sounds not the eternal rewards. Concerning such the savior said in a certain place: Truly I say to you, they have received their reward. Truly I say to you, they have received their reward. That is the frivolous fame which they love. They have this world's fame which they sought rather than the eternal reward which did not interest them.⁷⁸²

The second section connects to the act of knocking. In Matt 7:7 its effectiveness is assured; the knocking implied by Matt 25:11 fails. Ælfric resolves the apparent contradiction with an appeal to time—knocking now in the time of mercy will be effective. In the last day, however, it will be too little, too late. The third section, Matt 7:21–22 cooperates with the first to present a coherent plain-sense meaning for the application of the parable. While good works, confession of Jesus as Lord, and deeds of power are marks of discipleship, in and of themselves they do not guarantee entry into the final consummation. Rather, doing the will of the Father guarantees entrance. How these beseeching entrance failed to keep the will of the Father is not revealed—the first section, however, supplies for Ælfric a likely answer. The good works flowed from bad intentions, a desire for human praise rather than the love of God. Two features of this third section recommend it specifically for application to the parable: the dialogue and its result. Matt 7:21-23 functionally replicate the dialogue at the gate in Matt 25:12—both the request "Lord, Lord" and the response "I do not know you" are the same. Also in both cases those beseeching entrance are left outside, the spatial difference a clear reference to a relational difference—those who belong are within in the presence of Christ, those who do not are outside.

-

⁷⁸² Sume men sind swa bepæhte ðurh ydelne gylp. þæt hi doð for manna herunge swa hwæt swa hi doð. swiðor ðonne for godes lufon. ðonne sind hi stunte. þæt hi cepað þæs ydelan hlysan. na þæs ecan edleanes; Be swilcum cwæð se hælend on sumere stowe; Amen dico uobis. receperunt mercedem suam; Soð ic eow secge. hi underfengon heora mede. þæt is se ydela hlisa ðe hi lufodon; Habbon hi ðone woruldhlisan þe hi sohton. na ða ecan mede þe hi ne rohton; ll. 71-78.

Based on these texts, Ælfric interprets the allegory in this way: the virgins are all "faithful" of the church who have good works to their credit. The wise are those whose works are motivated by a love for God: the foolish are those whose works are motivated by a desire for earthly acclaim. All will die and be raised together. But in the great judgment when each individual's deeds are judged without reference to how other people perceived them, the foolish will be found wanting; Christ will deny them based on the vice that motivated their externally virtuous acts. The ignorance of humanity concerning the timing of the judgment—referred to under the symbol of midnight and directly by the concluding exhortation—is a warning for Ælfric's hearers to investigate their motives and to recall the proper reason for good deeds.

The Liturgical Context

In the lectionaries of the Benedictine Revival, Matthew 25:1–13 was utilized for a general class of occasions: feasts of multiple virgins. By Ælfric's time, there was a fairly well defined set of saints venerated in common by the Western Church. This sanctoral kalendar was born from attempts to standardize liturgical practice across the West—particularly by Charlemagne and the rulers after him—but does not represent in any way the establishment of a centralized control or process over who was named a saint and how it occurred. As a result, the addition of new saints to the kalendar was not an uncommon occurrence in an early medieval monastery.

As the new saints were added to the yearly round, they required liturgical texts so that they could be properly venerated. Thus a generic set of texts were appointed to cover a variety of saintly classifications: apostles, martyrs, confessors, bishops, abbots/abbesses, and virgins. These appeared in both singular and multiple configurations. Practically speaking, the multiple appeared most often in the case of groups of martyrs who were killed together. The various liturgical books had a set of the most necessary of these—though not necessarily standardized—referred to as the Commons of the Saints. 783 The Leofric Missal, for instance, contains commons for the vigil and feast of one apostle, a feast of multiple apostles, vigils of holy martyrs, a feast of one martyr, a feast of multiple martyrs, vigils of holy confessors, a feast of one confessor, a feast of multiple confessors, a feast of virgins and martyrs, and a feast of several saints in common.⁷⁸⁴ Paul the Deacon includes similar categories including materials for a vigil of one apostle, a feast of one apostle, a feast of one martyr, a feast of multiple martyrs, a feast of multiple confessors, and a feast of multiple virgins. Ælfric, in turn, provides in the Catholic Homilies for a feast of one apostle, a feast of multiple apostles, a feast of one martyr, a feast of multiple martyrs, a feast of one confessor, a feast of multiple confessors, and a feast of multiple virgins.⁷⁸⁵

⁷⁸³ This Commune Sanctorum is typically found after the listings for the temporal and sanctoral cycles. Sometimes the dedication of a church is included with these as well.

⁷⁸⁴ Vigilia sive natali unius apostoli [f. 204r.], natali plurimorum apostolorum [f. 204v.], vigiliis sanctorum martirum [f. 205r.], natali unius martyris [f. 205v.], natali plurimorum martyrum [f. 206r.], vigiliis sanctorum confessorum [f. 206v.], natali unius confessoris [f. 207r.], natali plurimorum confessorum [f. 208r.], natali virginum et martyrum [f. 208v.], and natali plurimorum sanctorum communiter [f. 209v.].

⁷⁸⁵ These are homilies CH II.33-39.

The parable of the wise and foolish virgins is appointed for a general kind of liturgical occasion, the common of multiple virgins, and also appears early at the feast of some virgin martyrs, most notably Agatha. The logic here is not too hard to trace—but is more interesting than it first appears. The obvious correlation is that the occasion celebrates virgins who, by virtue of their sanctity, have entered into the final consummation and stand now in the presence of God and the Lamb as intercessors on behalf of the faithful; the passage itself features multiple virgins who enter into the marriage banquet that is surely a symbol of eschatological rejoicing.

This interpretation is well attested in the liturgical variety of the church. Hesbert's great collection of antiphons and responsories from medieval Europe contains four antiphons⁷⁸⁶ and twelve responsories⁷⁸⁷ that use this passage. Most of them connect it explicitly to virgin saints. Sometimes exegetical decisions are already encoded into these texts. Responsory 7228 which circulated with two different verses, is a prime example:

You will not be among the foolish virgins, says the Lord, but you will be among the wise virgins; taking up the oil of gladness in their lamps, going out to meet him they will meet the Bridegroom with the palms of virginity.

(Verse 1a): But at midnight a cry was made: Behold, the Bridegroom comes, go out to meet him.

(Verse 1b): But coming they will come with exultation, carrying their sheaves

Response: Going out to meet him they will meet the Bridegroom with the palms of virginity.⁷⁸⁸

The interpretation identifying the oil as "the oil of gladness" is interesting and has two complementary possible sources. The early medieval church read VgPs 44 narrating the marriage between Christ and women religious—"the oil of gladness" is mentioned in v. 8. The gloss may be a direct reference to the psalm. Alternatively, Augustine made the connection between the psalm and Matt 25 in De Div Quaest. 83.

⁷⁸⁷ Responsaries 6151, 6760, 6806, 6807, 6809, 7139, 7228, 7496, 7667, 7668, 7803, ["Ecce" is unnumbered].

⁷⁸⁶ Antiphons 3730, 4543, 4953a, 4953b.

⁷⁸⁸ Non eris inter virginis fatuas, dicit Dominus, sed eris inter virgins prudentes; accipientes oleum laetitiae lampadibus suis, obviantes obviaverunt Sponso cum palma virginitatis.

Verse 1b represents another exegetical option. While Verse 1a uses a text from the Matthean parable, Verse 1b introduces a passage from the Psalms (VgPs 126:6). According to Augustine, the psalm refers to almsgiving; the sowing of the seed is the giving of alms, returning with sheaves speaks of the eschatological rewards of the almsgiving.⁷⁸⁹

Another antiphon also with two options for the verse explicitly cites VgPs 44 in one of them while in the midst of using the image of the lamps from Matt 25:

The five wise virgins took oil in their vases for their lamps. But at midnight a cry was made: Behold, the bridegroom comes, go out to meet Christ the Lord.

(Verse 1b): Listen, daughter and see, and incline your ear, for the king has desired your beauty.

But at midnight a cry was made: Behold, the bridegroom comes, go out to meet Christ the Lord.⁷⁹⁰

This responsories specifically identifies the bridegroom as Jesus and stitches together VgPs 44:11a, 12a into a harmonious whole. This move mutually reinforces the interpretative connections between Matt 25 and virgin saints and VgPs 44 as well.

However, there is a second correlation that could be masked by the more obvious relationship between the virgins in the passage and the ascetical class of virgins in the Western Church. Indeed, this second correlation only becomes visible when lectionary selections are viewed across categories. The parables of the gospels are found in various ⁷⁹⁰ COA 7496: Quinque prudentes virgines acceperunt oleum in vasis suis cum lampadibus. Media autem nocte clamor factus est: Ecce sponsus venit, exite obviam Christo Domino.

⁷⁸⁹ NPNF¹ 8.605-6 Enn. Ps. 126.10-11.

V. B. Audi filia et vide et inclina aurem tuam, quia concupivit rex speciam tuam. - Media.

places in the most prevalent Anglo-Saxon lectionaries, but the parables of Matt 13 and 24-25 are particularly appointed for the saints. In a representative Anglo-Saxon lectionary, the Gospel list contained in London, BL, Cotton Tiberius A.ii, 791 Matthew 13:44-52, a cluster of three kingdom parables, is appointed eight times, all for feasts of virgins and their companions. 792 Likewise the parable of the industrious servant in Matt 24:42-47 is appointed six times, generally for feasts of popes and bishops. 793 Our parable of the wise and foolish virgins is appointed for five occasions—again, virgin saints. 794 Finally the following parable of the talents (Matt 25:14-23) appears just four times also on feasts of bishops and popes.⁷⁹⁵ Thus, there is an overwhelming preference to assign the Matthean parables of the kingdom to saints. As a result, there would be no doubt in the early medieval mind that the protagonists of the parable would be saints of some kind.

Perhaps the most interesting feature of this homily is the way it reveals Ælfric taking part in the conversations of his day, both the critical and the popular. Ælfric explicitly mentions that this passage had been treated by both Augustine and Gregory. The conclusion of his introduction implies that the text to follow is from Gregory: "Moreover Augustine the wise man explains to us its deepness and also the holy Gregory wrote concerning this same text saying thus..."796 To assume along with DeLubac that what follows is simply plagiarism of Gregory is quite incorrect.⁷⁹⁷

By Ælfric's day, Paul the Deacon's homiliary appointed four homilies for feasts of multiple virgins.⁷⁹⁸ The first taken from Haymo of Auxerre treats Matt 13:44–45; the second ⁷⁹¹ This is Lenker's Oe.

⁷⁹² St Lucia (Dec 13), St Prisca (Jan 18), Octave of St Agnes (Jan 28), St Pudentiana (May 18), St Praxedis (Jul 21), St Sabina (Aug 29), and Sts Eufemia, Lucia, Geminianus (Sep 16) and for the Common of Several Virgins. ⁷⁹³ St Marcellus (Jan 16), St Urban (May 25), St Eusebius (Aug 14), St Augustine of Hippo (Aug 28), St Calistus (Oct 14), and the Common of One Confessor.

⁷⁹⁴ St Agnes (Jan 21), an alternate for the Octave of St Agnes (Jan 28), St Agatha (Feb 5), St Cecilia (Nov 22), and the Common of Several Virgins.

⁷⁹⁵ St Leo (Apr 11), St Martin (Nov 11), St Silvester (Dec 31), and Common of One Confessor.

⁷⁹⁶ Ac Augustinus se wisa us onwreah ða deopnysse. and eac se halga Gregorius ymbe ðis ylce awrat þus cweðende; ll. 25-27.

⁷⁹⁷ De Lubac, Medieval Exegesis, 2.120.

⁷⁹⁸ In Migne, these are Homilies XCIII-XCVI.

is Augustine's Homily 93 on Matthew 25:1–13; the third is Gregory's Homily 12 on Matt 25:1–13; the fourth, also on Matt 25:1–13, is a homily incorrectly attributed to Chrysostom. Following the expectations and purposes of early medieval homiletics, Ælfric remains within the critical conversation of catholic orthodoxy by dutifully using passages and insights from both Augustine and Gregory but in their combination creates a new interpretation different from both his sources in a number of respects. Furthermore, an excursus within this sermon takes to task a heretical teaching that impacts the passage's meaning current in the popular conversation of his day.

Gregory's Homily 12⁷⁹⁹ is a second edition of Augustine's Sermo 93. Augustine's sermon is a longer and more thorough text that works carefully through each of the details in the parable, allegorizing each and identifying the various intertextual cross-references to other biblical passages that ground his reading. Augustine often makes interpretive suggestions, deploying texts in their support that he later dismisses in favor of other equally or more supportable choices, giving this sermon a thick, complex texture that requires careful attention to follow the various threads and possibilities Augustine raises. While there are moments and sections of exhortation, the sermon communicates the feel of an interpretive puzzle slowly worked out in the hearer's presence.

Gregory's version greatly simplifies the work and moves it in different directions. Gone are the interpretive dead ends; reduced are the number of scriptural citations. In addition to creating a leaner text with a cleaner flow, Gregory ratchets up the hortatory character by building on the elements of eschatological urgency. A helpful initial paragraph presents the main thrust of his interpretation up front and a colorful local story of one who repented too late rounds out the conclusion. Indeed, an Augustinian passage that acknowledged the reality of the Bridegroom's continued delay is removed entirely to maintain a sense of immanent expectation.

⁷⁹⁹ Note that in the Hurst translation, he relies upon an idiosyncratic numbering system; in that edition this text is reckoned as Homily 10.

As the commentators agree, the heart of the parable lies bound up with the lamps and their oil. Augustine presents the lamps as good works. Of the modern commentators surveyed here, Davies and Allison take the whole lamp/oil complex to be good works, Boring does not mention the lamps but considers oil to be good works. Hare states that a majority of interpreters take the oil as good works but he ultimately rejects it. Both Davies and Allison and Hare present Augustine's option of the oil as love. One a strictly literal level this is correct; Augustine says plainly: "...charity seems to be signified by the oil..." However, this kind of simple identification is not enough to grasp Augustine's argument. After all, most every ambiguous sign for Augustine is somehow love! He gives voice to this hermeneutic in On Christian Teaching:

Therefore a method of determining whether a locution is literal or figurative must be established. And generally this method consists in this: that whatever appears in the divine Word that does not literally pertain to virtuous behavior or to the truth of faith you must take to be figurative. Virtuous behavior pertains to the love of God and of one's neighbor; the truth of faith pertains to a knowledge of God and of one's neighbor. . . . But Scripture teaches nothing but charity, nor condemns anything except cupidity, and in this way shapes the minds of men. . . . Therefore in the consideration of figurative expressions a rule such as this will serve, that what is read should be subjected to diligent scrutiny until an interpretation contributing to the reign of charity is produced. 801

When Augustine identifies something as love, he often later qualifies it by describing who is love with what in what manner or to what degree.

Furthermore, when Augustine identifies the oil, he does so with a certain amount of hedging:

.

⁸⁰⁰ Sermo 93.5.

⁸⁰¹ De Doc. Chr. 3.10.14, 15; 3.15.23.

By what make the distinction [between wise and foolish]? By the oil. Thinkest thou that it is not charity? This we say as searching out what it is; we hazard no precipitate judgment. I will tell you why charity seems to be signified by the oil. The Apostle says, "I show unto you a way above the rest." Though I speak with the tongues of men and of Angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." This, that is "charity," is "that way above the rest," which is with good reason signified by the oil. For oil swims above all liquids. Pour in water, and pour in oil upon it, the oil will swim above. Pour in oil, pour in water upon it, the oil will swim above. If you keep the usual order it will be uppermost; if you change the order, it will be uppermost. "Charity never faileth." 802

However, this is an Augustinian trial interpretation and by the end of the sermon he has settled on a second—different—interpretation. Later on, Augustine returns to the oil:

"Now those wise virgins had brought oil with the in their vessels; but the foolish brought no oil with them." What is the meaning of "brought no oil with them in their vessels"? What is "in their vessels"? In their hearts. Whence the Apostle says, "Our glorying is this, the testimony of our conscience" (2 Cor 1:12). There is the oil, the precious oil...⁸⁰³

Thus, Augustine's real interpretation is not love after all. The rest of the sermon makes clear that this "inner oil of conscience" is fundamentally about motive—are the good works (the lamps) borne of an intent to please and garner respect from humans or God?

Gregory operates as a classical early medieval monastic author in that he takes up the substance of Augustine's work but reorders, restructures, and repurposes it. Gregory's Homily 12, as an epitome of Augustine, cuts out the initial interpretive feint altogether. Thus, Gregory takes the portion above from the end of Augustine's sermon and inserts it in his

-

⁸⁰² Sermo 93.5.

⁸⁰³ Sermo 93.9.

⁸⁰⁴ Sermo 93.17.

initial discussion of the oil and flasks. He corrects the potentially misunderstood reference by removing it altogether.

Ironically, Ælfric misses the fact that Gregory's homily is a simplification of Augustine's and attempts to harmonize the two. As a result, he seizes upon Augustine's clear statement about oil as love and the engaging illustration of oil and water, then immediately follows it up with Gregory's explanation taken from the end of Augustine's sermon. The result is that he presents Augustine's two options together without differentiation, making the oil a love-based motive for good works that should be directed to God. The rest of his sermon, following on the heels of Gregory, actually does a better job than Gregory of showing that the whole issue of motive is rooted in the concept of love and is focused on who and what the virgins (i.e., Christians) love: God or human praise. Nevertheless, this sermon shows us Ælfric deeply embedded in the critical conversation. He is determined to pass on the wisdom of the orthodox teachers even if in doing so he confounds Gregory's editorial purposes!

Despite his concern for the critical conversation in this sermon, this is not Ælfric's sole focus. After his discussion of those who are locked out of the marriage feast, Ælfric makes an aside that addresses the popular conversation of his day. As mentioned in Chapter 2, one of the motives for this cycle of English language homilies was to counteract the heresies found in earlier English texts. ⁸⁰⁵ The direct correspondence between Ælfric's description given here and a sermon surviving in a unique copy in the Vercelli Book is nothing short of amazing given the rarity of survivals from the period. Homily XV of the Vercelli Book is an English paraphrase of the longer recension of the Apocalypse of Thomas ⁸⁰⁶ which describes the rise of the antichrist, the signs wracking creation the week before the judgment, then the events of the day of judgment itself. Included among them is a scene of intercession to which Ælfric is probably referring:

⁸⁰⁵ See a discussion of the likely candidates for exactly which heresies Ælfric was referring to in Malcomn Godden, "Ælfric and the Vernacular Prose Tradition," pages 99-117 in Old English Homilies, edited by Paul Szarmach.

⁸⁰⁶ This text was condemned in the 6th century Psuedo-Gelasian Decretal.

Then our dear Lady, the Blessed Mary, Christ's mother, will see the heap of the wretched, the sorrowful, and the blood-stained, and then she with a weeping voice will arise and fall at Christ's knees and at his feet, and she will say:

'My Lord Savior Christ, you humbled yourself so that you were dwelling in my womb.

Do not allow the power of the devils to have so great a crowd of your handiwork.' Then our Lord will grant to the holy, blessed Mary a third part of that sinful crowd.

"Then, still further, there will be a very great crowd--very sorrowful and blood-stained--ever since they were engendered. And then will arise the holy Michael, and he will creep on hands and feet, and with great grief and many tears, he will bow very humbly at the Lord's feet and at his knee. And he will say thus, 'My Almighty Lord, you granted to me authority under you over all heaven's kingdom so that I might be your defender of (tortured?) souls. Now I pray to you, my Lord, never let the devils have power in this way over a great crowd of your handiwork.' And then our Lord will grant to the holy St. Michael a third part of the sinful crowd.

"And then, still further, there will be a very great, vast throng of sinful souls. And then will arise the holy St. Peter, His chief thane, very sorrowful and very sad and with many sorrowful tears, and he with great humility will fall at the feet of the Savior and at his knees. And he will say: 'My Lord, my Lord Almighty, you gave me and you entrusted to me the key of heaven's kingdom, and also (the key) of hell-torments, so that I might bind as many on earth as I wished and release as many as I wished. I ask you, my Lord, because of your kingly rule and because of your majesty that you grant to me the third part of this poor and sinful band.' And then our Lord will grant to the holy Saint Peter the third part of the sinful band.

"And then, still further, there will be a very great throng, and that (throng) very hateful to God. Then the trustworthy Judge will took on the right side towards His chosen and holy ones, and He will say thus: 'Venite, benedicti patris mei, percipite regnum quod vobis paratum est ab origine mundi!' He spoke thus, 'Come now, you blessed ones, and receive the kingdom of my Father that was prepared for you from the beginning of middle-earth.' [Matt 25:41] Then our Lord will look on the left hand at the sinful band. And he will say thus to them, Discedite, maledicti, in ignem aeternum qui praeparatus est diabulo et angelis eius.' He spoke thus, 'Depart, you wicked ones from me into the nethermost punishment of hell into the eternal fire which was prepared for the devil and for you who obeyed him.' [Matt 25:41]⁸⁰⁷

The issue at stake is the perennial argument between justification by grace versus the demands of discipleship. The Vercelli homily represents an early medieval form of justification by grace where those deserving punishment receive grace from Christ the eschatological judge through the intercession of the saints. It is worth noting that this vision is probably not too far off from how many understood the role of the saints in salvation.

Too, the Vercelli homily notes that not all are saved in this fashion—there is still a large crowd handed over to torment; due to a missing manuscript leaf it is unclear who is in which crowd. Clearly one group is saved while another is damned. Presumably all those within the Church are saved by the intercession of the saints. Ælfric condemns a concept much like this on the grounds that it undercuts true discipleship and represents—to use the phrase of Dietrich Bonhoeffer—"cheap grace." Instead, he retains the strong focus on discipleship and obedience (with a special emphasis on chastity) found throughout his works.

Discussion

The modern study of parables inaugurated by Jülicher began with a strict distinction between parables and allegories. Jülicher and the scientific study of the New Testament were legitimately reacting to allegorical excess in the interpretation of the parables that had shaped the Church's interpretation for centuries. In Ælfric's interpretation we are able to see a number of factors that led to the Protestant backlash against the traditional Catholic reading of the Scriptures that was then carried on by the scientific study of the New Testament. First, Ælfric never questions whether this text might be anything other than an allegory. He begins from a position of certainty that substituted meanings are at the foundation of understanding this text properly. Second, his interpretation is focused entirely on the moral meaning of the text. Indeed, he goes out of his way to emphasize the need for good works against a contemporary reading that elevated grace. He is therefore guilty of "moralizing," a polemical term used particularly in Lutheran circles to suggest that he is transforming a message of grace into law.

⁸⁰⁷ Jean Anne Strebinger, trans., "Homily XV," pages 98-103 in The Vercelli Book Homilies, edited by Paul Szarmach, (Toronto Old English Series, 5; Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1981), 101-2.

By and large these critiques are not entirely off-base. That is, Ælfric is fundamentally interested in how the meaning of the text can be enacted as Christian behavior. There is no doubt that this text is legitimately an admonition; it is counseling a particular kind of action. Since that action is not entirely clear, Ælfric uses the patristic teaching at his disposal to turn the text into an imperative that he and his community may embody. In his defense, Ælfric has treated this text fully and appropriately based on his understanding of the exegetical task.

However, Ælfric's reading cannot be considered the authoritative early medieval interpretation of this text. Rather, it is one aspect of the total reading.

Ælfric's sermon—or any early medieval sermon for that matter—is one piece of the liturgy. The most discursive piece to be sure, but one element that makes up the whole. As with the Beatitudes, Ælfric's sermon and the antiphons and responsories of the liturgy utilize different aspects of the text. To use John Cassian's distinctions (which, to be clear, Ælfric does not), Ælfric's sermon focuses on the tropological meaning of the text, the "moral explanation pertaining to correction of life and to practical instruction." The antiphons and responsories, on the other hand, utilize the text in such a way to expose its anagogical meaning, "which mounts from spiritual mysteries to certain more sublime and sacred heavenly secrets...by which words are directed to the invisible and to what lies in the future."

⁸⁰⁸ John Cassian, Conf. 14.8.3. Ramsey, Conferences, 510.

As with the Beatitudes, Ælfric's exposition is primarily moral and focused on practical instruction but an anagogical and eschatological component to the text is explored within the liturgy contributing to a holistic reading of the text. Through its fusion of the anagogical and eschatological, the early medieval reading invites modern scholarship to reflect on the character and extent of eschatology found within Matthean texts—or any religious texts for that matter. Early medieval interpreters were certainly no strangers to eschatological readings in the modern sense; indeed, one of the hallmarks of Gregory the Great's preaching was an intense focus on the end-times and on the radical in-breaking of divine power into the quotidian world. Rhetorically, he used eschatology as a spur to move his congregation to enact the moral meaning of the text.

What we find in the antiphons and responsories is of a different character, though. By interweaving the gospel texts with narratives of sanctity and eschatological power—like healings—the antiphons and responsories show how early medieval readers perceived the potential of eschatological participation and power within the embodiment of the texts. For them, eschatology was not just a characteristic of the text but a consequence of it as well. The value in this perspective for modern academics is in the way that it challenges their conceptual categories. They may not find these mechanisms in the text; they may not believe that these reflect the intention of the author. Nevertheless, the early medieval monastic readers of these religious texts found this potential within them. Wrestling with these readings may lead contemporary critical scholars to new possibilities for understanding how religious texts inspire transformation either in relation to or apart from original authorial intent.

⁸⁰⁹ John Cassian, Conf. 14.8.3, 6. Ramsey, Conferences, 510, 511.

Chapter 6

This project has sought to evaluate whether early medieval monastic biblical interpreters can serve as effective conversation partners for modern scholars committed to the scientific study of the Scriptures. The first step was to identify the qualities that would characterize effective conversation partners. The second step was locating a representative interpreter within a known milieu; Ælfric of Eynsham, a key figure of the second generation of England's Benedictine Revival, was an ideal candidate given the size of his extant works and the amount of information available on his time and place. The third step was to understand the relationships, the similarities and differences, between the interpretive projects of early medieval monastics and modern academic interpreters. In the fourth step, Ælfric and his interpretive milieu were put into relation with four modern scholars.

From my perspective, Ælfric and his early medieval colleagues are worthy conversation partners. Their worthiness is based on their deep commitment to engaging Scripture and their faith in its transformative power. By giving attention to this author and his milieu, I am in no way claiming his superiority over other potential interlocutors. Rather, I suggest that whenever modern scholars of the text seek to understand the potential for moral, spiritual, or formative meanings within the text, the early medieval monastic interpreters would serve as excellent guides, representing actual communities who sought to put those aspects of the text into practice.

In the course of laying these foundations, this project has produced the first full-length study of early medieval monastic biblical interpretation that analyzes homiletical material within its liturgical context. Much yet remains to be done. Specifically, what I have done is only the foundations for the conversation and not the true conversation itself. The true conversation would be creative exeges informed both by the academy and the early medieval monastics.

To those who would continue on to this conversation, I offer some initial observations concerning the character of early medieval monastic interpretation on the Gospel of Matthew and how it best complements modern exegetical techniques. Rather than reading it as an inferior form of modern scholarship, I read early medieval monastic interpretation within its cultural context. While focused on the same texts, monastic culture had radically different purposes in reading Scripture that required different methods and commitments from the modern academic project which—likewise—should be understood in its cultural context. Once the differences between the two sets of reading practices are understood as fundamentally cultural, then points of comparison and coherence can be found and utilized for cross-cultural dialogue. While there are some cultural similarities between the two, the great difference involves the telos of interpretation and the paradigmatic context for encountering the Scriptures. For the early medieval monastics, the telos of Scripture study and embodiment was no less than the attainment of sanctity; the paradigmatic context for encountering the Scriptures was the liturgy. Monastic exegetical efforts, especially homiletical ones, must be understood within the full scope of the liturgical setting.

Thus, the critical conversation and the appropriation of patristic wisdom was liturgically governed; homiliaries mediated the wisdom of the past through the liturgical framework. The selection of Scriptures encountered was likewise embedded within a liturgical framework governed by the liturgical year which was itself a harmonization and interpretation of the life, death, resurrection, and ascension of Jesus as recorded in the Gospels. This is the broader context of the liturgy. The narrower context requires an understanding of how the various liturgical services themselves served to interpret biblical texts.

The early medieval liturgy foregrounds the value of underdetermined pregnant juxtapositions in self-consciously spiritual texts. By placing scriptural texts in relation to one another without explication—as in the antiphons and responsories of the Office and the sung propers of the Mass—the liturgy engages its participants in the process of meaning-making that is simultaneously collective, as it occurs within the context of shared communal worship, yet is deeply individual as well, since each participant creates relationships between the texts in light of their own spiritual progress and understanding. The yearly repetition of the liturgical cycles brings the community back to these juxtapositions time and again, offering new opportunities for meaning that build on the previously created collective and individual meanings. A young monk or nun might expect to experience each cycle fifty times or more. Furthermore, the practice of lectio played off the liturgically grounded meanings. Monastic interpretation did not seek to move forward but to circle ever deeper into the meaning of the texts.

The more discursive elements of the liturgy—from the collects and benedictions up to and including sermons and homilies—are oriented primarily towards the moral sense of the text and secondarily towards the doctrinal. However, it is worth noting that there is no clear and easy distinction between them: the moral sense of the text, the doctrine contained within the text, and Christology itself freely shade into one another. Rooted in a robust understanding of 2 Tim 3:16-17, emphasizing the utility of Scripture for instruction for the accomplishing of good works, the interpretation of Matthew is characterized by a robust imitation of Christ. Already focused in this direction by the Christ-shaped Temporal cycle and augmented by the Sanctoral cycle, the gospel is particularly parsed for the presence of virtues—preeminently humility and obedience. Through this process, readers become attuned to these virtues and to methods of reading that maximize their presence.

Another means of reading, sometimes alongside the moral, sometimes in support of it, is the mystical sense. Most of the strategies that fall under the category of "mystical" involve matching patterns of various sorts. Patterns found in other scriptural passages, in liturgical rites, in the etymology of a name, or in events of everyday life may be mapped upon the patterns in the text and meaning is produced through these intersections. However readings are derived, their primarily role is focused upon action. Scripture does not consist of texts to be read as much as commands to be obeyed or, in a gentler formulation, oracles to be enacted.

The goal of enacting these moral meanings is portrayed in anagogical readings found in some of the discursive materials, particularly collects and benedictions, but are primarily suggested by antiphons and responsories. These liturgical elements introduce the sanctoral and eschatological elements that may not be located in the sermons alone. As a result, any analysis of early medieval monastic exegesis that looks only at the content of the sermons and homilies will inevitably miss the interpretive aspects of the other liturgical materials that provided the proper context for the homilies, and can be assumed to be known by the medieval speakers and hearers.

Although they use different reading strategies for the sake of different purposes, early medieval monastic interpreters can serve profitably as outside voices to challenge the conceptions and constructions of the modern American academy. Kümmel was entirely correct that early medieval exegetes have little to offer a New Testament inquiry focused upon the history of the ideas of the earliest Christian texts. Similarly, they do little to illumine the intentions of the original author. If, however, the inquiry asks about the meaning potential within the biblical texts—what texts themselves could mean, how they could be used—then the early medieval monastic interpreters provide a valuable and reliable example of how text-centered communities read and embodied the New Testament.

In particular, they offer special promise when readers seek to understand how the texts could be used for the purposes of moral and spiritual formation. While the modern academic community prides itself on reading Scripture as any other text—and rightly so given dogmatic restraints of previous generations—the early medieval monastics will continue to insist that the New Testament writings are self-consciously religious texts. Moral and spiritual meanings are intrinsic to their very nature. In this capacity, the spirituality of the early medieval monastics reminds present-day scholars that this fundamental fact should not be ignored. Asking how these texts form the morality and spirituality of the individuals and communities who gather around them are entirely legitimate questions.

Perhaps the best ending note is to recognize the solid commitment of early medieval monastic exegesis to multiple meanings. Meanings and interpretations—whether found in homilies, in liturgies, in illuminations, or in songs—were utilized where and when they were useful. There is a decidedly non-hegemonic character to early medieval monastic interpretation which makes it quite amenable as a conversation partner that offers possibilities but does not insist on one or even a limited selection of readings. A foundational text for this commitment is in John Cassian's Conferences 14.11.1-5 where, in the person of Abba Nesteros, Cassian offers no less than five different interpretations of the apparently straightforward command, "Do not commit fornication." Each is appropriate to different circumstances, and each builds to the cultivation of virtue at a different level of meaning.

Furthermore, this commitment to multivalence enables the spirit of exegetical play found especially in the homilies and responsories where intertextual connections between widely disparate texts flow seamlessly into one another and illuminate practices and ideals embodied in the Christian communities. Even within this form of play there were boundaries and constraints, to be sure, but different boundaries than those that constrain present-day academic readers. They were the boundaries of shared liturgical practice and experience and formational boundaries that identified meaningful readings as those that edify the community towards true love of God and the accomplishment of good works.

⁸¹⁰ Cassian, Conf. 14.11.1-5. Ramsey, Conferences, 515-6.

Appendix

CATHOLIC HOMILY I, 11: 1ST SUNDAY IN LENT (MATT 4:1-11)

128	200
	DOMINICA I IN QVADRAGESSIMA ⁸¹¹	First Sunday in Lent
	ductus est iesus in desertum ab spiritu. et reliqua .	Jesus was lead into the desert by the Spirit (and the rest)
	Ic wolde eow trahtnian þis godspel þe man nu beforan eow rædde:	I would treat this Gospel for you which the man now read before you;
	ac ic ondræde bæt ge ne magon þa miclan deopnesse bæs godspelles	but I fear that you may not understand the great depth of this gospel
5	swa understandan swa hit gedauenlic sy. Nu bidde ic eow þæt ge beon	as it should be fitting. Now I bid you that you will be gebyldige on eowrum gebance oð þæt we bone traht mid godes fylste	patient in your thoughts so that we might consider this pericope with oferrædan magon.	God's help.
	Se hælend wæs gelæd fram ðam halgan gaste to anum westenne: to	The Savior was led by the Holy Ghost to a desert so
	ðy þæt he wære gecostnod fram deofle. & he ða fæste feowertig daga &	that he might be tempted by the devil and he fasted there for forty days and 10	feowertig nihta. swa þæt he ne onbyrigde ætes ne wætes on eallum þam	forty nights so that he did not eat food nor drink in all at fyrste: ac sybðan him hingrode. Þa genealæhte se costnere: & him to	period so that he hungered. Then approached the tempter and said to him, cwæð. Gyf ðu sy godes sunu: cweð to þysum stanum þæt hie beon	"If you are God's son, say to these stones that they will be awende to hlafum. Þa &wyrde se hælend & cwæð. Hit is awriten. Ne	turned to bread." Then the Savior answered and said, "It is written: Man
	leofað se man na be hlafe anum: ac leofað be eallum þam wordum þe	will not live by bread alone but will live by every word that 15	gað of godes muðe. Þa genam se deoful hine. & gesette hine uppon	goes from God's mouth." The devil took him and set him upon þam scylfe þæs heagan temples & cwæð. Gif ðu godes sunu sy feal nu	the pinnacle of the high temple and said, "If you are God's son, let yourself
	adun. hit is awriten: þæt englum is beboden be ðe þæt hi þe on hyra	now fall down. It is written: that angels are commanded concerning you handum ahebban. þæt ðu for ðon ne þurfe þinne fot æt stane	that they will hold you in their hands that you thus will not have occasion to ætspyrnan. Þa cwæð se hælend eft him to. Hit is awriten: ne fanda þu	strike your foot against a stone." Then the Savior said to him again: "It is 20	þines drihtnes. Þa genam se deoful hine eft. & gesette hine uppon	written Do not test your Lord." The devil took him again and set him upon anre swiðe heahre dune. & æteowde him ealles middaneardes welan &	a very high mountain and displayed to him all the riches of the world and his wuldor. & cwæð him to. Ealle ðas þincg ic forgife ðe: gif ðu wilt	its glory and said to him, "All these things I give you if you will

pg 267

⁸¹¹ The Old English text and line-numbering is from P.A.M. Clemoes, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text (EETS s.s. 17; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 266-74.

23	feallan to minum fotum & gebiddan ðe to me. Da cwæð se hælend	fall to my feet and pray to me." Then the Saviour said him to. Ga þu underbæc. sceocca: hit is awriten: Gehwa sceal hine	to him, "Go you behind; flee; it is written: Everyone shall 25	gebiddan to his drihtne anum. & him anum þeowgian. Þa forlet se	pray to his God alone and worship him only." Then the devil left deoful hine: & him comon englas to & him benedon.	him and angels came to him and served him.
	Se halga gast lædde þone hælend to þam westene to ðy þæt he ðær	The Holy Spirit led the Savior to the desert so that he could be gecostnod wære. Nu wundrað gehwa hu se deoful dorste geneal-	tempted there. Now every one wonders how the devil dares to approach æcan to ðam hælende þæt he hine costnode. Ac he ne dorste cristes	the Savior that he could tempt him. But he would not dare to test 30	fandian gif him alyfed nære. Se hælend com to mancynne. for ði þæt he	Christ if he did not permit him. The Savior came to mankind so that he wolde ealle ure costnunga oferswiðan. mid his costnungum: &	would overcome all of our temptations with his temptation and oferswiðan urne þone ecan deað mid his hwilwendlicum deaðe. Nu	overcome our eternal death with his temporary death. Now
	wæs he swa eaðmod þæt he geðafode þam deofle þæt he his fandode. & he	he was so humble that he tolerated the devil that he might test him, and he geþafode lyþrum mannum þæt hi hine ofslogon. Deoful is ealra unriht-	permitted vile men to slay him. The devil is the head
35	wisra manna heafod: & þa yfelan men sint his lyma. Nu geþafode god	of all unrighteous men and evil men are his limbs. Now God permitted
	þæt þæt heafod hine costnode: & þæt ða lymu hine ahengon.	the head to tempt him and his limbs to hang him.
	Pam deofle wæs micel twynung hwæt crist wære: his lif næs na	The devil was in great doubt what Christ was. His life was not gelogod swa swa oðra manna lif: Crist ne æt mid gifernysse. ne he ne	arranged as the lives of other men. Christ did not eat with gluttony nor dranc mid oferflowednysse: ne his eagan ne ferdon worigende geond	did he drink to excess nor did his eyes go wandering aimlessly for 40	mislice lustas: þa smeade se deoful hwæt he wære: hwæðer he wære	lusts so that the devil pondered what he was—whether he was godes sunu se ðe mancynne behaten wæs. Cwæð ða on his geþance	God's son who was promised to mankind. Then he said in his thoughts þæt he fandian wolde hwæt he wære. Þa fæste crist feowertig daga &	that he would test what he was. Then Christ fasted for forty days and feowertig nihta. on an. þa on eallum ðam fyrste ne cwæð se deoful to	forty nights continually. Then in all that time the devil did not say to him þæt he etan scolde. for ðan þe he geseh þæt him nan ðincg ne	him that he should eat because he saw that he did not hunger for anything.
45	hingrode. eft þa ða criste hingrode æfter swa langum fyrste þa wende	Then, after Christ hungered after a long time then the devil truly thought se deoful soðlice þæt he god nære: & cwæð to him. Hwi hingrað ðe: gif	that he was not God and said to him, "Why do you hunger? If ðu godes sunu sy. wend þas stanas to hlafum. & et. Eaðe mihte god se	you may be God's son, turn these stones to bread and eat." Easily could the de awende wæter to wine. & se de ealle gesceafta of nahte geworhte:	God who turned water to wine and who worked all creation from nothing, eaðelice he mihte awendan þa stanas to hlafum: ac he nolde nan ðing	easily could he turn the stones to bread but he would not do anything
50	doon be ðæs deofles tæcunge. Ac cwæð him to &sware. Ne leofað na se	at the devil's direction. But he said to him and answered, "Man does not mann. be hlafe anum: ac leofað be ðam wordum þe gað of godes	live by bread alone, but lives by the words which go from God's muðe. Swa swa þæs mannes lichama leofað be hlafe: swa sceal his	mouth." Just as men's bodies live by bread, so shall his

53	sawul lybban be godes wordum: þæt is be godes lare. þe he þurh wisum	soul live by God's words which is by God's teaching which he set down mannum on bocum gesette. Gif se lichama næfð mete. oððe ne mæg	through wise men in books. If the body does not have food or it may not 55	mete þicgean. þonne forweornað he & adeadað: swa eac seo sawul gif	accept food then it perishes and dies. So also the soul if

	heo næfð þa halgan lare: Heo bið þonne weornigende. & mægenleas.	it does not have the holy teaching. It will then pine away and be feeble.
	Purh þa halgan lare. heo bið strang & onbryrd to godes willan.	Through the holy teaching it will be strong and ardent for God's will.
	Þa wæs se deofel æne oferswyðed fram criste. & he ða hine genam &	Then was the devil first overcome by Christ. Then he took him and bær up on ðam temple. & hine gesette æt þam scylfe. & cwæð to him:	bore him up on the temple and set him on the pinnacle. He said to him,
60	gif ðu godes sunu sy. sceut adun. for ðan ðe englum is beboden be ðe	"If you may be God's son, shoot down because the angels are commanded
	þæt hi ðe on handum ahebban þæt ðu ne ðurfe þinne fot æt stane	concerning you that they will hold you in their hands that you need not ætspurnan. Her began se deoful to reccenne halige gewritu. & he leah	strike your foot against a stone." Here the devil began to quote holy mid ðære race: for ðan þe he is leas & nan soðfæstnys nis on him: ac	writings but he lied with their exposition because he is a liar and no he is fæder ælcere leasunge. Næs bæt na gewriten be criste. be he ða	truthfulness is in him but he is the father of all lying. This was not written concerning Christ as he had 65	sæde: ac is awriten be halgum mannum: hi behofiað engla fultummes	said but is written concerning holy men. They need the help of angels on ðisum life. þæt se deoful hi costnian ne mote. swa swiðe swa he	in this life that the devil might not tempt them as severely as he wolde. Swa hold is god mancynne bæt he hæfð geset his englas us to	could. So faithful is God to mankind that he has set his angels as guardians hyrdum. þæt hy ne sceolon na geþafian þam reðum deoflum þæt hi us	over us that they should not permit the cruel devils to fordon magon. Hi moton ure afandian: ac hi ne moton us nydan to	destroy us. They may test us but they may not compel us to do
70	nanum yfele: buton we hit sylfe agenes willan doon burh ða yfelan	any evil except what we do of our own will through the evil tyhtincge bæs deofles. We ne beoð na fulfremede: butan we beon	incitement of these devils. We will not be perfected unless we are afandode: burh ða fandunge we sceolon geðeon. gif we æfre wiðsacað	tested; through the testing we should grow if we ever renounce the deofle & eallum his larum. & gif we genealæcað urum drihtne mid	devil and all his teaching, if we approach our Lord with geleafan. & lufe. & godum weorcum: gif we hwær aslidon arison eft	faith and love and good works, and if anywhere we should slip immediately
75	þærrihte. & betan georne þæt ðær tobrocen byð.	will rise again and eagerly amend what was broken.
	Crist cwæð þa to þam deofle. ne sceal man fandian his drihtnes. Þæt	Christ said to the devil, "Man shall not test his Lord." That would be an wære swiðe gilplic dæd. gif crist scute þa adun. þeah ðe he eaðe	exceedingly ostentatious deed if Christ would shoot down (though he easily mihte butan awyrdnesse. his lima nyðer asceotan. se ðe gebigde bone	could without harm; his limbs would not break who bent the heagan heofenlican bigels: ac he nolde nan ðincg don mid gylpe for	arch of the high heavens), but he would not do anything for a boast

80	ðan ðe se gilp is an heafodleahter: þa nolde he adun asceotan. for ðon	because a boast is a chief sin. Therefore he would not shoot down because ðe he onscunode þone gilp. Ac cwæð ne sceal man his drihtnes	he rejected boasting. But he said, "Man shall not test his Lord." The man fandian. Se man fandað his drihtnes. se ðe mid dyslicum truwan. &	tests his Lord who trusts with foolishness and with boasts that a certain mid gilpe. sum wunderlic þinc on godes naman don wyle: oððe se þe	wonderful thing will be done in God's name or who would command a sumes wundres dyslice. & butan neode. æt gode abiddan wile. Þa wæs	certain wonder from God foolishly and without need. Thus was 85	se deoful oðre siðe þurh cristes geþyld oferswiðed.	the devil overcome another time through Christ's endurance.
	Pa genam he hine eft. & abær hine uppon anre dune: & æteowde	Then he took him again and bore him upon a solitary mountain and him ealles middaneardes welan. & his wuldor. & cwæð to him. Ealle	showed him all the wealth and glory of earth and said to him, "All

	ðas þincg ic forgife ðe. gif ðu wilt afeallan to minum fotum. & þe to	these things I will give you if you will fall to my feet and me gebiddan. Dyrstelice spræc se deoful her. swa swa he ær spræc þa	pray to me. The devil spoke presumptuously here just as before he spoke
90	ða he on heofenum wæs. þa ða he wolde dælan heofonan rice. wið	when he was in heaven that he would share in the kingdom of heaven
	his scyppend. & beon gode gelic: ac his dyrstignyss hine awearp þa	against his creator and be like God, but his presumptuousness cast him into helle: & eac nu his dyrstignys hine genyðerode. þa þa he þurh	then cristes prowunge forlet mancynn of his anwealde. He cwæð. þas	into hell and also now his presumptuousness condemned him when he lost ðincg ic forgife ðe: him ðuhte þæt he ahte ealne middaneard. for ðon þe	mankind from his power through Christ's passion. He said, "This thing I give you" for he thought that he owned all earth because no
95	him ne wiðstod nan man ær ðan ðe crist com: þe hyne gewylde.	man could stand against him before Christ came who conquered him.
	Hit is awriten on halgum bocum. Eorðe. & eal hyre gefyllednyss. &	It is written in the Holy Book, "Earth and all her fullness and eal imbhwyrft. & þa ðincg þe on þam wuniað. ealle hit sindon godes	all its extent and all things that live therein and all are God's possessions"
	æhta. & na diofles. Þeahhwæðere crist cwæð on his godspelle be ðam	and not the devil's. However, Christ said in his gospel concerning the deofle: þæt he wære middaneardes ealdor: & he sceolde beon ut	devil that he is the leader of earth and he should be driven out.
100	adræfed. He is þæra manna ealdor. þe lufiað þisne middaneard. &	He is the leader of the men who love this earth and ealne heora hiht on ðisum life besettað & heora scyppend forseoð.	set all their hope in this life and scorn their Creator.
	Ealle gesceafta. sunne. & mona & ealle tunglan. land. & sæ. & nytenu.	All creatures, sun and moon and all stars, land and sea and cattle, ealle hi þeowiað hyra scyppende: for ðon þe hi farað æfter godes	They all serve their Creator because they go after God's dihte. Se lyþra man ana þonne he forsihð godes beboda: & fulgæð	direction. The vile man alone scorns God's commands and cleaves

105	deofles willan. oððe þurh gitsunge. oððe þurh leasunge. oððe ðurh	to the devil's will either through avarice or through lying or through graman. oððe þurh oðrum leahtrum. þonne bið he deofles þeowa:	wrath or through other sins thus he is a slave of the devil;
	ponne he deofle gecwemð: & pone forsihð þe hine geworhte.	thus he pleases the devil and thus scorns the one who created him.
	Crist cwæð þa to ðam deofle. ga ðu underbæc scucca. Hit is	Christ said to the devil, "Go you behind; flee; it is awriten: Man sceal hine gebiddan to his drihtne. & him anum	written: Man shall pray to his Lord and serve him alone."
110	þeowgean. he cwæð to ðam deofle ga ðu underbæc. deofles nama is	He said to the devil, "Go you behind." The devil's name is gereht niðerhreosende. Niðer he ahreas & underbæc he eode fram	reckoned 'Falling down.' Down he fell and back he went from the frymðe his anginnes. Þa ða he wæs ascyred fram ðære heofenlican	foundation of his beginning when he was cut off from heavenly blisse. Onhinder he eode eft burh cristes tocyme: onhinder he sceal	bliss. Backward he went again through Christ's advent, backward he shall gaan on domesdæge: þonne he bið belocen on hellewite. on ecum	go on doomsday when he will be locked in hell-torments in eternal
115	fyre: he & ealle his geferan. & hi næfre syððan ut brecan ne magon.	fire, he and his companions and they never thereafter may break out.
	Hit is awriten on ðære ealdan æ. þæt nan mann ne sceal hine	It is written in the old law that no man shall gebiddan to nanum deofelgylde. ne to nanum þinge buton to gode	pray to any devil-idol nor to anything except God alone
	anum. for don þe nan gesceaft nis wyrde þæs wyrdmyntes buton se	because no creation is worthy of this dignity but rather the one
	ana. se ðe scyppend is ealra þinga. to him anum we scolun us	alone who created all things. To him alone we should

120	gebiddan: he ana is soð hlaford & soð god. We biddað þingunga æt	pray. He alone is true Lord and true God. We ask intercessions from halgum mannum þæt hi sceolon us þingian to heora drihtne & to urum	holy men that they should interceded for us to their Lord and to our drihtne: Ne gebidde we na þeahhwæðere us to him swa swa we to	Lord. We do not pray, however, to them just as we gode doð: ne hi þæt geþafian nellað: Swa swa se engel cwæð to iohanne	do to God. They will not permit it—just as the angel said to John þam apostole. þa ða he wolde feallan to his fotum. He cwæð ne do þu	the apostle when he would have fallen at his feet. He said, "Do not do 125	hit na. þæt ðu to me abuge. Ic eom godes þeowa swa swa ðu. & þine	That, that you do reverence to me. I am God's servant just like you and gebroðra: gebide ðe to gode anum.	your brother. Pray to God alone."
	Pa forlet se deoful crist. & him comon englas to. & him ðenedon. He	Then the devil left Christ and angels came to him and served him. He wæs gecostnod swa swa man: & æfter ðære costnunge him comon	was tempted just as man and after the temptation the holy angels came to

		,
129	halige englas to. & him ðenedon swa swa heora scyppende. Buton se	him and served him just as their Creator. Unless the
130	deofol gesawe þæt crist mann wære: Ne gecostnode he hine: & buton he	devil saw that Christ was a man he would not tempt him and unless he soð god wære noldon þa englas him þenian. Micel wæs ures	was not true God the angels would not serve him. Great was our Savior's hælendes eaðmodnyss. & his geðyld on þisre dæde. He mihte mid	humility and his endurance in this deed. He could with one anum worde besencan þone deoful. on ðære deopan nywelnysse: ac	word have sunk the devil into the deep abyss but he ne æteowde his mihte. ac mid halgum gewritum he andwyrde þam	he did not display his might. Rather, he answered with the holy writings the
135	deofle. & sealde us bysne mid his geðylde. þæt swa oft swa we fram	Devil and gave us an example with his endurance that as often as we þwyrum mannum ænig ðing þrowiað: þæt we scolon wendan ure mod	suffer anything from depraved men, we should turn our mind to godes lare swiðor þonne to ænigre wrace.	to God's teaching more than to any revenge.
	On ðreo wisan bið deofles costnung: þæt is on tyhtinge. on lust-	In three ways are the devil's temptations: that is in enticement, in fullunge. on geðafunge. Deofol tyht us to yfele: ac we sculon hit	pleasure, in consenting. The devil entices us to evil but we should 140	onscunian. & ne genyman nane lustfullunge to ðære tyhtinge: gif	shun it and not accept any pleasure from the enticement; if þonne ure mood nimð gelustfullunge. þonne sceole we huru	when our mind receives pleasure then should we yet wiðstandan. þæt ðær ne beo nan geþafung to ðam yfelum weorce. Seo	withstand that there will not be any consenting to the evil work. The yfele tyhting is of deofle: þonne bið oft þæs mannes mood gebiged to	evil inclination is from the devil when often the mind of man will incline to ðære lustfullunge: Hwilon eac aslit to ðære geþafunge. for ðon þe we	pleasure, sometimes, also, be destroyed by the consent
145	sind of synfullum flæsce acennede. Næs na se hælend on ða wisan	because we are born from sinful flesh. The Savior was not tempted in this gecostnod. for ðan þe he wæs of mædene acenned buton synne. & næs	way because he was born without sin from a maiden and had nothing
	nan ðincg þwyrlices on him. He mihte beon gecostnod þurh tihtinge:	perverse in him. He might be tempted through enticement, ac nan lustfullung ne hrepede his mood. Þær næs eac nan geþafung:	but no pleasure touched his mind. There also was no consent for ðan þe ðær næs nan lustfullung: ac wæs þæs deofles costnung for	because there was no pleasure but the devil's tempting was thus 150	ðy eall wiðutan. & nan þincg wiðinnan. Ungewiss com se deoful to	all without and nothing within. Ignorantly the devil came to criste: & ungewis he eode aweg. for don be se hælend ne geswutelode	Christ and ignorantly he went away because the Savior did not reveal na him his mihte: ac oferdraf hine geþyldelice: mid halgum ge-	his might to him but overcame him patiently with holy writings.

	writum.
	Se ealda deoful gecostnode urne fæder adam on ðreo wisan: ðæt is	The old devil tempted our father Adam in three ways: that is 155	mid gifernesse. & mid idelum wuldre. & mid gitsunge: & þa wearð he	with gluttony and with vainglory and with greediness and then he was oferswiðed. for ðon þe he geþafode. þam deofle. on eallum ðam þrim	overcome because he consented to the devil in all three costnungum. Þurh gifernysse he wæs oferswyðed þa ða he þurh	temptations. Through gluttony he was overcome when he ate the
_
_	272
158	deofles lare æt þone forbodenan æppel. Þurh ydelum wuldre he wæs	forbidden apple through the devil's teaching. Through vainglory he was oferswiðed: þa ða he gelyfde þæs deofles wordum þa ða he cwæð.	overcome when he believed the devil's words when he said that 160	Swa mære ge beoð swa swa englas gif ge of ðam treowe etað: & hi ða	"You will be as excellent as the angels if you eat of the tree" and they gelyfdon his leasungum. & woldon mid ydelum gylpe beon beteran	believed his lying and, with idle boasts, wished be better bonne hi gesceapene wæron. þa wurdon hi wyrsan. Mid gitsunge he	that they were created when they became worse. With greediness he wæs oferswiðed. þa þa se deofol cwæð him to: & ge habbað gescad	was overcome when the devil said to him, "and you will have knowledge of ægðer ge godes ge yfeles. Nis na gitsung on feo anum: ac is eac on	both good and evil." Greediness is not for wealth alone
165	gewindinge interite geomegoe.	but is also in the desire for greater dignity.
	Mid ðam ylcum þrim ðingum. þe se deoful þone frumscapenan	With each of these three things the devil overcame the first-created man oferswiðde: Mid ðam ylcum crist oferswyðde hine & astrehte.	Man. With the same, Christ overcame him and laid him low.
	Đurh gifernesse fandode se deofol cristes þa þa he cwæð: Cweð to	Through gluttony the devil tested Christ when he said, "Say to these stones
	ðisum stanum þæt hi beon to hlafum awende. & et. Þurh ydelum wuldre	that they should be turned to bread" Through vainglory
170	he fandode his: þa ða he hine tyhte þæt he scolde sceotan nyþer of ðæs	he tested him when he incited that he should fall down from the temples scylfe. Purh gitsunge he fandode his þa þa he mid leasunge	temple's pinnacle. Through greediness he tested him when he, with lying, him behet ealles middaneardes welan: gif he wolde feallan to his	promised all the world's wealth if he would fall at his fotum. Ac se deoful wæs ða oferswiðed þurh crist on ðam ylcum	feet. But the devil was then overcome by Christ in the same gemetum þe he ær adam oferswiðde: þæt he gewite fram urum	ways in which he overcame Adam before so that he went out from our 175	heortum: Mid ðam infære gehæft. mid ðam ðe he in afaren wæs. & us	hearts which were bound from his entry when he went in and bound us.
	gehæfte.	·
	We gehyrdon on ðisum godspelle. þæt ure drihten fæste feowertig	We heard in this gospel that our Lord fasted forty days daga & feowertig nihta on an. Þa ða he swa lange fæste. Đa ge-	and forty nights consecutively. When he fasted for so long he manifested
	1

swutelode he ða miclan mihte: his godcundnysse: burh ða he mihte on eallum bisum andweardan life buton eorðlicum mettum lybban.

fæste na burh his agene mihte: ac burh godes. Eac se witega gif he wolde. Eft þa ða him hingrode. þa geswutelode he. þæt he wæs soð mann & for ði metes behofode. Moyses se heretoga fæste eac feowertig daga. & feowertig nihta. to dy bæt he moste underfon godes æ: ac he ne

We heard in this gospel that our Lord fasted forty days and forty nights consecutively. When he fasted for so long he manifested then the great might of his divinity through which he might live in all this present life without earthly meat

if he wanted. After that when he hungered he manifested that he was true man and for that needed food. Moses the war leader also fasted forty days and forty nights so that he might receive God's law but he did not fast through his own might, but through God's. Also the prophet

185	helias. fæste eallswa lange: eac burh godes mihte. & syððan wæs	Elijah fasted as long, also through God's might and afterward was genumen. butan deaðe of ðisum life.	taken without death from this life.
	Nu is dis fæsten eallum cristenum mannum geset to healdenne: on	Now is this fast set for all Christian men to observe in ælces geares ymbryne: ac we moton ælce dæg ures metes brucan mid	the cycle of each year but we may each day take our food with forhæfednysse: þæra metta þe alyfede sind. Hwi is þis fæsten þus	restraint—of the food which is allowed. Why is this fast thus 190	geteald: þurh feowertig daga. On eallum geare sind getealde þreo	calculated as forty days? In all the year there are counted three hund daga & fif & sixtig daga. þonne gif we teoðiað þas gearlican	hundred days and sixty-five days. Then if we take a tenth of the year's dagas. þonne beoð þær six & þrittig teoðincgdagas: & fram þisum	days, then there are thirty-six tithe days and from this day until dæge oð ðam halgum easterdæge: Sind twa & feowertig daga: do	the holy Easter there are forty-two days.
	þonne þa six sunnandagas of ðam getæle. Þonne beoð þa six & þrittig.	Taking then the six Sundays from the total there are thirty-six
195	þæs geares teoðingdagas us to forhæfednysse getealde.	of the year's tithe days for us to observe with restraint.
	Swa swa godes .æ. us bebyt þæt we scolon ealle þa ðinc þe us	Just as God's law commands that we should pay a tenth of gescotað of ures geares teolunge gode þa teoðunge syllan: Swa we	all things from our year's toil to God, so we scolon eac on ðisum teoðingdagum urne lichaman mid	should also in these tithing-days tithe our bodies with restraint forhæfednysse gode to lofe teoðian. We sculon us gearcian on eallum	to the praise of God. We should prepare ourselves in all
200	þingum swa swa godes þegnas æfter ðæs apostoles tæcunge: on	things just as God's thanes after the apostle's teaching in great
	miclum gebylde: & on halgum wæccum: on fæstenum: on clænnysse.	patience and in holy vigils, in fasting, in chastity of mind and body modes & lichaman. for ði læsse pleoh. bið þam cristenum menn þæt he	for it will be less danger to a Christian man that he flæsces bruce: þonne he on ðisre halgan tide wifes bruce. Lætað	partake of meat than that he should partake of a woman in this holy time.
	aweg. ealle saca. & ælc geflit. & gehealdað þas tid mid sibbe. & mid	Put away all strife and all quarreling and keep this time with peace and 205	soðre lufe: For ðon ne bið nan fæsten gode andfenge buton sybbe. &	with true love for no fast is acceptable to God unless you reconcile and doð swa swa god tæhte. Tobræc ðinne hlaf: & syle ðone oðerne dæl:	do just as God teaches. Break your loaf and give the other portion hungrium menn. & læd into ðinum huse. wædlan. & þa earman.	to hungry men and lead into your house the destitute and poor and ælfremedan menn: & gefrefra hi mid ðinum godum. Þonne ðu	foreign men and cheer them with your goods. When you see the naked, nacodne geseo: scryd hine. & ne forseoh ðin agen flæsc. Se mann þe	clothe them and do not overlook your own flesh. The man who
210	fæst butan ælmessan: he deð swilce he sparige his mete. & eft. ett þæt he	fasts without almsgiving—he is thus sparing in his meat and after he eats

211	ær mid forhæfdnysse foreode: ac þæt fæsten tælð god. Ac gif ðu fæstan	what he previously set aside with restraint—this fast mocks God. But if wille gode to gecwemednysse. þonne gehelp ðu earmra manna mid	you wish your fast to be acceptable to God then help poor men with þam dæle ðe ðu ðe sylfum oftihst: & eac mid maran gif ðe to onhagie.	the portion which you withhold from yourself and also with more if it is Forbugað ydele spellunge. & dyslice blissa. & bewepað eowre synna: for	possible. Refrain from idle chatter and foolish merriment and lament your 215	ðan þe crist cwæð. wa eow þe nu hlihgað: Ge scolon heofian. &	sins because as Christ said, "Woe to you who laugh now, you shall lament wepan. Eft he cwæð. Eadige beoð þa ðe nu wepað: for ðon þe hi	and weep" after he said, "Blessed are those who weep now because they scolon beon gefrefrode.	shall be comforted."

	We lybbað mislice on twelf monðum: nu scole we ure gymeleaste	We live aimlessly for twelve months. Now we should repair our on þisne timan geinnian & lybban gode: We ðe oðrum timan us	carelessness in this time and live to God, we who live for ourselves in the 220	sylfum leofodon. And swa hwæt swa we doð to goode: uton don þæt	other times. And so that we may do well, let us do this buton gylpe. & idelre herunge. Se man be for gilpe hwæt to goode	without boasts and idle praise. The man who does good in order to boast deð: him sylfum to herunge: næfð he ðes nane mede æt gode: ac hæfð	praises himself, he does not receive any reward from God but he receives his wite. Ac uton don swa swa god tæhte: þæt ure goodan weorc beon.	his punishment. But let us do just as God teaches that our good works on ða wison mannum cuðe: þæt hi magon geseon ure godnysse: & þæt hi	might be known by wise men that they may see our goodness and that they 225	waldhan. & henon ame neotennean rader god ammittime. Se oe as	may marvel and praise our heavenly Father, God Almighty who forgilt mid hundfealdum swa hwæt swa we doð earmum mannum for	rewards us with a hundredfold what we do for poor men his lufon: se ðe leofað & rixað a butan ende. AMEN.	for love of him who lives and reigns without end. Amen.

CATHOLIC HOMILY I, 36: FEAST OF ALL SAINTS (MATT 5:1-12)

	KALENDE NOVEMBRIS NATALE ⁸¹²	NOVEMBER 1 ST :
	OMNIVM SANCTOR VM	ALL SAINTS
	HALIGE lareowas ræddon þæt seo geleaffulle gelaþung þisne dæg	Holy teachers explain that the faithful church this day
	eallum halgum to wurðmynte mærsie & arwurþlice freolsie for þan	glorifies with dignity and reverently celebrates all saints because
5	ðe hi ne mihton heora ælcum synderlice freolstide gesettan ne nanum	they may not all receive their own particular celebration day. No men on andwerdum life nis heora ealra nama cuð swa swa iohannes	man in this present life is able to know all of their names just as John se godspellere on his gastlicere gesihbe awrat bus cwebende: Ic	the evangelist in his spiritual vision wrote saying thus: "I geseah swa miccle meniu swa nan man geriman ne mæg of eallum	saw so great a number as no man may reckon from all
	þeodum & of ælcere mægðe standende ætforan godes þrymsetle	peoples and from all tribes standing before the glory-seat
10	ealle mid hwitum gyrelum gescrydde healdende palmtwigu on heora	all dressed in white clothing holding palm branches in their handum & sungon mid hluddre stemne: Sy hælu urum gode þe sit	hands and singing with loud voices: Let there be prosperity to our God
	ofer his þrymsetle And ealle englas stodon on ymbhwyrfte his	who sits upon his glory-seat' and all angels stood around his þrymsetles & aluton to gode þus cweþende Sy ur um gode bletsung &	glory-seat and bowed to God thus saying: 'Let there be to our God
	beorhtnys wisdom & þancung & wurðmynt & strencð on ealra	blessing and splendor, wisdom and thanks and dignity and strength for 15	worulda woruld AMEN	ever and ever amen.
	Godes halgan sind englas & men: Englas sind gastas buton licha-	God's holy ones are angels and men. Angels are spirits without bodies man þa gesceop se ælmihtiga wealdend on micelre fægernysse him	who the almighty Creator shaped for himself in great beauty
	sylfum to lofe & to wuldre & wurþmynte his mægenþrymme on	to praise and to glorify and magnify his greatness
	ecnysse: Be þam we forhtiað fela to sprecenne for þan ðe gode anum	eternally. Concerning them we fear to speak much because God alone
20	is to gewitenne hu heora ungesewenlice gecynd buton ælcere be-	knows how their invisible kind remain pure without any smitennysse oððe wanunge on ecere hluttornysse þurhwunað;	stain or weakening eternally.

22	Đeahhwæðere we oncnawað on halgum gewritum þæt nigon engla	Moreover we acknowledge in holy writings that nine angel
	wer od sind wuniende on heofonlicum þrymme þe næfre nane synne	armies dwell in heavenly glory which never commit any sin.
	ne gefremodon þæt teoðe werod þurh modignysse losode & to awyri-	The tenth army which fell through pride and 25	gedum gastum behwyrfede wurdon & ascofene of heofenlicere	were changed into accursed spirits and banished from the heavenly myrhðe into hellicere susle;	joys into the tortures of hell.
	Soðlice sume þæra haligra gasta þe mid heora scyppende þurh-	Truly certain of the holy spirits which remain from their creation

⁸¹² The Old English text and line-numbering is from P.A.M. Clemoes, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text (EETS s.s. 17; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 486-96.

	wunedon to us asende cumað & towearde þing cyþað; Sume hi	are sent to us and proclaim future things. Certain of them work signs and wyrcað be godes dihte tacna & gelomlice wundra on middanearde;	numerous wonders on earth at God's direction.
30	Sume hi sind ealdras gesette bam obrum englum to gefyllenne ba	Some are lords who appoint other angels to accomplish godcundlican gerynu; Đurh sumum geset god & toscæt his domas;	the mysteries of God. God appoints through some and decides his judgments.
	Sume hi sind swa micclum to gode gebeodde bæt nane oðre him	Some are so greatly associated to God that no others are betweonan ne sind & hi ðonne on swa micclan maran lufe byrnende	between them and they are burning with so great a love
	beoð swa micclum swa hi godes beorhnysse scearplicor sceawiað; Nu	so greatly that they show keenly God's brightness. Now
35	is þes dæg þysum englum arwurþlice gehalgod & eac þam halgum	is the day when these angels are hallowed reverently and also the holy mannum þe ðurh micclum geþingþum fram frymþe middaneardes	men who through great intercessions from the beginning of the world gode gebugon; Of bisum wæron ærest heahfæderas eawfæste &	thrive with God. Among these are the first religious patriarchs and wuldorfulle weras on heora life witegena fæderas þæra gemynd ne	glorious men in their lives, fathers of the prophets, whose memory will
	bið forgyten & heora nama þurhwunað on ecnysse for þan ðe hi	not be forgotten and whose names remain for ever because they 40	wær on gode gecweme burh geleafan & rihtwisnysse & gehyrsum-	were pleasing to God through faith and righteousness and obedience.
	nysse; Þysum fyligð þæra witegena gecorennys; Hi wæron godes	These are followed by the chosen of the prophets. They were God's gesprecan & þam he æteowode his digelnysse & hi onlihte mid gife	speakers and he revealed to them his mysteries and they were illuminated
	þæs halgan gastes swa þæt hi wiston þa toweardan þing & mid	with the gift of the Holy Spirit so that they knew future things and witigendlicere gyddunge bodedon; Witodlice þa gecorenan witegan	and spoke with prophetic poetry. Naturally the chosen prophets
45	mid manegum tacnum & forebicnungum on heora life scinende	were revealed with many signs and portents in their lives
	wæron; Hi gehældon manna untrumnysse & deadra manna lic to life	They healed men's weaknesses and raised dead men back to life.
	arærdon; Hi eac for folces þwyrnysse heofenan scuras oftugon & eft	They also, on account of the perversity of the people, withdrew heaven's showers and miltsiende getipodon; Hi heofodon folces synna & heora wrace mid	often granted mercy. They lamented the sins of the nation and prevented him sylfum for scytton; Cristes menniscnysse & his browunge &	their persecution by themselves. They prophesied Christ's incarnation,
50	æriste & upstige & þone micclan dom þurh ðone halgan gast	his passion, rising, ascension and the great judgment taught by the Holy gelærede hi witegodon;	Ghost.
	On þære niwan gecyðnysse for ðstop iohannes se fulluhtere se þe	In the New Testament came forth John the Baptist who spoke mid witegunge cristes tocyme bodade & eac mid his fingre hine	prophecies about Christ's coming and also signified him with his gebicnode; Betwux wifa bearnum ne aras nan mærra man þonne is	finger. From out of the children of women none will arise greater than

55	iohannes se fulluhtere; Disum godes cempan geþwærlæcð þæt twelf-	John the Baptist. Of the champions of God, it is agreed that the number is fealde getel cristes apostola þa he sylf geceas him to leorningcnihtum	reckoned at twelve apostles of Christ whom he himself chose as disciples
	& hi mid rihtum geleafan & sobre lare geteah & eallum beodum to	and they were brought to true belief and true learning and were sent lar eowum gesette swa þæt se sweg heora bodunge ferde geond ealle	to teach all nations so that so that the sound of their preaching would go eorþan & heora word becomon to gemærum ealles ymbhwyrftes; To	around the whole world and their word come to all ends of the earth. To 60	þysum twelf apostolum cwæð se ælmihtiga hælend ge sind mid-	these twelve apostles the almighty Savior said: "You are the light of the danear des leoht scine eower leoht swa ætfor an mannum þæt hi geseon	world; let your light shine thus before men that they may see eowere godan weorc & wuldrion eowerne fæder þe on heofenum is;	your good works and glorify your father who is in heaven.

	Ge sind mine frynd & ic cydde eow swa hwæt swa ic æt minum fæder	You are my friends and I say to you that whatsoever I hear so my father
	gehyrde; Eornostlice drihten forgeaf þa mihte his twelf apostolum þæt	Earnestly the Lord gave his power to his twelve apostles that 65	hi ða ylcan wundra worhton þe he sylf on middanearde gefremode: &	they might also work the wonders which he himself performed on the
	swa hwæt swa hi bindað ofer eor þan þæt bið gebunden on heofenum	earth and whatsoever they bind upon earth that will be bound in heaven
	& swa hwæt swa hi unbindað ofer eorþan þæt bið unbunden on	and whatsoever they unbind on earth will be unbound in heofenum; Eac he him behet mid soðfæstum behate þæt hi on þam	heaven." Also he ordered them with truthfulness commanding that in the micclum dome ofer twelf domsetlum sittende beoð to demenne	great judgment they would be sitting to judgment in twelve judgment seats
70	eallum mannum þe æfre on lichaman lif under fengon;	all men who ever received life in the body.
	Æfter þam apostolican werode we wurþiað þone sigefæstan heap	After the army of the apostles we honor the triumphant host godes cybera be burh mislicum tintregum cristes browunge werlice	of God's martyrs who through great tortures manfully conformed to the geefenlæhton & þur h mar tyrdome þæt upplice rice geferdon; Sume hi	suffering of Christ and through martyrdom entered the upper kingdom.
	wæron mid wæpnum ofslegene: sume on lige forswælede; Oþre mid	Some were slain with weapons, some consumed by fire. Others with 75	swipum ofbeatene ohre mid stengum hurhdyde; Sume on hengene	scourges were beaten, others thrust through with stakes. Some hung on gecwylmede sume on widdre sæ besencte; Oþre cuce behylde oþre	crosses, some sank in the wide sea. Others were flayed alive, others mid isenum clawum totorene; Sume mid stanum ofhrorene sume	torn with iron claws. Some were overwhelmed with stones, some mid winterlicum cyle geswencte sume mid hungre gecwylmede;	afflicted with winter's cold, some tormented with hunger.
	Sume handum & fotum for corfene folce to wæfer syne for geleafan &	The hands and feet of some were cut off as a spectacle for the people for their belief and 80	halgum naman hælendes cristes; Da sind þa sigefæstan godes frynd	the holy name of Christ the savior. These are the triumphant friends of þe ðæra forscyldgodra ealdormanna hæse forsawon & nu hi sind	God for whom the wicked governors had contempt, but now they are gewuldorbeagode mid sige heora þrowunga on ecere myrhþe; Hi	crowned with the victory of their sufferings in eternal joy. They mihton beon lichamlice acwealde ac hi ne mihton fram gode burh	may have been killed bodily but they would not turn from God despite nanum tintregum beon gebigede; Heora hiht wæs mid undeadlicnysse	any torture. Their hope was fulfilled in immortality

85	afylled þeah þe hi ætforan mannum getintregode wæron; Hi wæron	though they were tortured before men. They were scortlice gedrehte & langlice gefrefrode for þan þe god heora afan-	afflicted for a short time but cheered for a long time because their God
	dode swa swa gold on ofene & he afunde hi him wyr be & swa swa	tested them just as gold in an oven and he found them worthy and just as halig offrung he hi underfeng to his heofenlicum rice;	a holy offering he received them into his heavenly kingdom.
	Æfter ablunnenre ehtnysse reþra cyninga & ealdormanna on	After the cessation of the cruel persecutions of kings and governors
90	siblicere drohtnunge godes gelabunge wæron halige sacerdas gode	holy priests of God prospered under peaceful conditions for God's church.

	beonde; Pa mid sohre lare & mid halgum gebysnungum folces men to	They, by true learning and holy example, pointed men of the nations to gode symle gebigdon; Heora mod wæs hluttor & mid clænnysse	God's joys. Their minds were pure and filled with chastity
	afylled & hi mid clænum handum gode ælmihtigum æt his weofode	and they worshipped God almighty with clean hands at his altar
	þenodon mærsiende þa halgan gerynu cristes lichaman & his blodes;	glorifying the holy sacrament of Christ's body and his blood.
95	Eac hi offrodon hi sylfe gode liflice onsægednysse buton womme	They also offered themselves as living sacrifices to God without wicked
	oððe gemencgednysse þwyrlices weorces; Hi befæston godes lare	or sexually perverse works. They established God's teaching
	heora underbeoddum to unateorigendlicum gafole & heora mod mid	among their underlings as a permanent revenue and inclined their minds breatunge & bene & micelre gymene to lifes wege gebigdon & for	with compulsion and prayers and great diligence to life's way and nanum woruldlicum ege godes riht ne forsuwodon; & þeah ðe hi	not for any worldly thing scorned the proper fear of God. Though they 100	swurdes ehtnysse ne gefreddon þeah þurh heora lifes geearnungum	did not experience the persecution of the sword yet through the merit of
	hi ne beoð martyrdomes bedælede: for þan ðe martyrdom bið	their lives they were not deprived of martyrdom because martyrdom is gefremmed na on blodes gyte anum ac eac swilce on synna for hæfed-	accomplished not in blood alone but also in abstinence from sins
	nysse & on bigencge godes beboda;	and in the application of God's commands.
	Dysum fyligð ancer setlena drohtnung & synderlic ingehid; Da on	After these follow hermits and solitaries. They 105	westenum wuniende woruldlice estas & gælsan mid strecum mode &	dwelling in the desert tread down worldly pleasure and luxury with strength
	stiþum life fortreddon; Hi forflugon woruldmanna gesihþe & herunge	of mind and an austere life. They fled the sight and hearing of worldly men & on waclicum scræfum oððe hulcum lutiende deorum geferlæhte to	and lying in weak hovels or huts, associating with beasts, engellicum spræcum gewunode on micclum wundrum scinende	abiding in speech with angels, shining in great wonders, wæron; Blindum hi forgeafon gesihðe healtum færeld deafum hlyst	they gave sight to the blind, movement to the halt, hearing to the deaf,
110	dumbum spræce; Deoflu hi ofer swiðdon & afligdon & þa deadan þurh	speech to the mute. They conquered devils and put them to flight and then godes mihte arærdon; Seo boc þe is gehaten uita patrum sprecð	raised the dead through God's might. The book that is called Lives of the menigfealdlice ymbe þysser a ancer setlena & eac gemænelicer a	Fathers says much about these anchorites and also the general monastic muneca drohtnunge & cwyð ðæt heora wæs fela þusenda gehwær on	condition and says that there were many thousands who were in

114	westenum & on mynstrum wundorlice drohtniende ac swa þeah	the deserts and in monasteries living wonderfully just so
115	swipost on egipta lande; Sume hi leofodon be ofæte & wyrtum: sume	especially in the land of Egypt. Some of them lived by fruits and herbs;
	be agenum geswince; Sumum þenodon englas sumum fugelas oð	others by their own toil. Some were served by certain birds or by angels ðæt englas eft on eaþelicum forðsiþe hi to gode ferodon;	until angels after an easy death carried them to God.
	¥ Eala þu eadige godes cennestre symle mæden maria tempel	Ho! you fortunate mother of God ever virgin Maria, temple
	þæs halgan gastes mæden ær geeacnunge mæden on geeacnunge	of the Holy Ghost, virgin before conception, virgin in conception
120	mæden æfter geeacnunge micel is þin mærð on þysum freolsdæge	virgin after conception, great is your glory on this feast-day
	betwux þam for esædum halgum for þan ðe þurh þinre clænan	among the aforementioned saints because through your chaste cenninge him eallum becom halignys & þa heofonlican geþincðu; We	procreation they all became holy and the heavenly assembly! We sprecað be þære heofonlican cwene endebyrdlice æfter wifhade	speak about the heavenly queen in order after her gender

	þeahhwæðere eall seo geleaffulle gelaþung getreowfullice be hire	however all the faithful church truly sings concerning her
125	singð þæt heo is geufer od & ahafen ofer engla wer odum to ðam	that she is higher and elevated over the angel armies to the wuldor fullum heahsetle; Nis be nanum ohrum halgan gecweden bæt	glorious high seat. Concerning no other saint is it said that heora ænig ofer engla werod ahafen sy buton be marian anre; Heo	any were elevated above the angelic host except Maria alone. She æteowode mid hire gebysnungum þæt heofonlice lif on eorþan for þan	displayed with her example that heavenly life on earth because her ðe mægðhad is ealra mægna cwen & gefera heofenlicera engla;	maidenhood is queen of all maidenhoods and companion of the angels.
130	Dyses mædenes gebysnungum & fotswaþum fyligde ungerim heap	To this maiden's example and footsteps fled an uncountable number mæigðhades manna on clænnysse þur hwuniende for lætenum giftum	of people to maidenhood persevering in chastity abandoning marriage to þam heofenlican brydguman criste geþeodende mid anrædum	uniting with the heavenly bridegroom Christ with constant mode & haligre drohtnunge & sidefullum gyrlan to þan swiþe þæt	minds and holy conduct and modest clothing such that heora forwel menige for mægðhade martyrdom geþrowodon & swa	very many of them suffered martyrdom for maidenhood and so 135	mid twyfealdum sige to heofonlicum ear dungstowum wuldor fulle	with a twofold victory came to the glorious habitation.
	becomon;
	Eallum þisum for esædum halgum þæt is englum & godes ge-	All of the aforesaid saints, both angels and God's chosen
	corenum mannum is þyses dæges wurðmynt gemærsod on geleaffulre	men are on this day honorably praised in the faithful gelaðunge him to wurðmynte & us to fultome þæt we þurh heora	church to honor them and to help us that we through their 140	þingrædene him geferlæhte beon moton; Ðæs us getiþie se mild-	intercession might be united with them. This the mild-
	heorta drihten þe hi ealle & us mid his deorwurþum blode fram	hearted Lord permits us that they all and us with his precious blood deofles hæftnedum alysde; We sceolon on byssere mærlican freols-	might be redeemed from the devil's imprisonment. We should on this glorious feast-

- 8	171
143	tide mid halgum gebedum & lofsangum us geinnian swa hwæt swa	day with holy prayers and hymns include ourselves just as we on obrum freolsdagum ealles geares ymbrynes burh menniscre	we on other feast-days throughout the whole year should be 145	tyddernysse hwonlicor gefylldon & carfullice hogian bæt we to bære	filled with less worldly inclinations and more carefully consider how we ecan freolstide becumon;	might come to that eternal feast-day.
	DE EVVANGELIO	On the Gospel
	Videns iesus turbas ascendit in montem et reliqua	Jesus, seeing the crowds, went up the mountain
	Đæt halige godspel þe nu lytle ær ætforan eow geræd wæs	That holy gospel which now just a little bit before was read to you is
150	micclum gebwærlæcð þisser e freolstide for þan ðe hit geendebyrd	greatly harmonious with this feast-day because it orderly arranges ba eahta eadignyssa be ba halgan to heofenlicum gebingbum ge-	the eight blessings which brought the saints to heavenly intercession.
	brohton; Matheus awrat on bysum dægberlicum godspelle bæt se	Matthew wrote in today's gospel that the hælend on sumer e tide gesawe micele meniu him fyligende: þa astah	Savior at a certain time saw a great many following him. Then he went he uppon anre dune; Da ba he gesæt ba genealæhton his leorning-	up upon a mountain. When he sat, then he called his disciples
155		to him and he opened his mouth and taught them thus saying: "Blessed

	beoð þa gastlican þearfan for þan ðe heora is heofonan rice; Eadige	are the spiritually poor because theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed beoð þa liþan: for þan ðe hi geahniað þæt land; Eadige beoþ ða ðe	are the meek because they will own the land. Blessed are those who heofiað: for þan ðe hi beoð gefrefrode; Eadige beoð ða þe sind	lament because they will be comforted. Blessed are those who ofhingrode & ofþyrste æfter rihtwisnysse: for þan ðe hi beoð gefyl-	hunger and thirst after righteousness because they will be filled.
160	lede; Eadige beoð þa mildheortan for þan ðe hi begitað mildheort-	Blessed are the mild-hearted because they will receive mild-heartedness.
	nysse; Eadige beoð ða clænheortan for þan ðe hi geseoð god sylfne;	Blessed are the clean-hearted because they will see God himself.
	Eadige beoð ða gesibsuman for þan ðe hi beoð godes bearn ge-	Blessed are the peacemakers because they will be called sons of God.
	cigede; Eadige beoð þa ðe þoliað ehtnysse for rihtwisnysse for þan ðe	Blessed are those who suffer persecution for righteousness because heora is heofonan rice; Ge beoð eadige þonne eow man wyrigð &	theirs is the kingdom of heaven. You are blessed when men abuse you and 165	eower eht & ælc yfel ongean eow sprecð leogende for me; Blissiað &	persecute you and speak all manner of evil against you falsely because of fægniað for þan ðe eower med is menigfeald on heofenum;	me. Rejoice and exult because your reward is manifold in heaven.

167	♥ Se wisa augustinus trahtnode þis godspel & sæde þæt seo dun þe	The wise Augustine treated this gospel and said that the mountain where se hælend astah getacnað þa healican bebodu soþre rihtwisnysse: þa	the savior stood signified the lofty commands of true righteousness;
	læssan bebodu wær on gesette þam iudeiscum folce; An god	the lesser commands were given to the Jewish people. God alone
170	þeahhwæþer e gesette þurh his halgan witegan þa læssan bebodu	however established through his holy prophets the lesser commands for iudeiscre beode be mid ogan ba gyt gebunden wæs: & he gesette	the Jewish people when they were yet bound with fear and he established
	burh his agenne sunu þa maran bebodu cristenum folce þa þe he mid	through his only Son the greater commands for Christian folk when he sobre lufe to alysenne com; Sittende he tæhte þæt belimpð to	came with true love to redeem. Sitting he taught these things according to wur pscipe lar eowdomes; Him to genealæhton his discipuli þæt hi	the dignity of a teacher. He called his disciples to him that they might 175	gehendran wær on lichamlice þa ðe mid mode his bebodum ge-	grasp bodily that which he called them to in mind with his commands.
	nealæhton; Se Hælend geopenode his muð; Witodlice se geopenode	The Savior opened his mouth. Naturally he who opened his muð to þære godspellican lare se þe on þære ealdan æ gewune-	his mouth for the gospel teaching was he who in the old law used lice openode þæra witegena muð; Þeahhwæþere his muðes ge-	to open the mouth of the prophets. Nevertheless, his mouth's opening openung getacnað þa deoplican spræce þe he ða forð ateah;	signifies the deep speech which he then brought forth.
180	He cwæð eadige beoð ða gastlican þearfan for þan ðe heora is	He said Blessed are the spiritually poor because theirs is heofonan rice; Hwæt sind þa gastlican þearfan buton þa eadmodan	the kingdom of heaven. What are the spiritually poor except the humble þe godes ege habbað & nane toþundennysse nabbað; Godes ege is	who have the fear of God and do not have any arrogance? The fear of God wisdomes anginn: & modignys is ælcere synne angin; Fela sind þear fan	is the beginning of wisdom and pride is likewise the beginning of sin. Many þurh hafenleaste: & na on heora gaste: for þan ðe hi gewilniað fela to	are poor through poverty but not in spirit because they wish to have much.
185	hæbbenne; Sind eac oþre þearfan: na þurh hafenleaste ac on gaste	Likewise the other poor are not thus through poverty but in spirit for þan ðe hi sind æfter þæs apostolican cwyde swa swa naht	because they are according to the apostolic custom so that they had hæbbende & ealle þing geahniende; On þas wisan wæs abraham	nothing and shared all things. In this way Abraham was poor and þear fa & iacob & dauid se þe on his cynesetle ahafen hine sylfne	Jacob and David who on his throne restrained himself

	geswutelode þear fa on gaste þus cweþende; Ic soðlice eom wædla &	manifesting poverty in spirit saying thus: "I truly am destitute and 190	þearfa; Ða modigan rican ne beoð þearfan ne þurh hafenleaste ne on	poor." The proud rich are not poor neither through poverty nor in gaste: for þan ðe hi sind gewelgode mid æhtum & toþundene on	spirit because they abound with possessions and arrogance in mode; Purh hafenleaste & on gaste sind bear fan ba fulfremedan	mind. They are perfectly poor both through poverty and in spirit who are munecas be for gode ealle bing for lætað to ðan swibe bæt hi nellað	monks who gave up all things for God, so much so that they will not habban heora agenne lichaman on heora anwealde ac lybbað be	have authority over their own bodies but live according to the 195	heora gastlican lareowes wissunge & for þi swa micclum swa hi her	regulation of their spiritual teachers. For that they are so great that they
Pg.
196	for gode on hafenleaste wuniað: swa micclum hi beoð eft on þam	dwell in poverty for God here; so great that they will afterward abound in
	towear dan wuldr e gewelgode;	glory in the future.
	Eadige beoð ða liþan for þan þe hi þæt land geagniað; Ða sind liðe	Blessed are the meek because they will own the land. They are meek
	& gedefe þa ðe ne wiðstandað yfelum: ac ofer swiþað mid heora god-	and mild who do not withstand evil but overcome the evil with their
200	nysse þone yfelan; Hi habbað þæt land þe se sealmscop embe spræc;	goodness. They have that land which the psalmist speaks about:
	Drihten þu eart min hiht beo min dæl on þæra lybbendra eorþan;	"Lord, you are my hope; let my reward be in the land of the living."
	Đæra lybbendra eorbe is seo staðolfæstnys þæs ecan eardes on þam	The land of the living is the stability of the eternal earth where the gerest seo sawul: swa swa se lichama on eorban: se eard is rest & lif	soul reposes just as the body does in the earth; the earth is the repose and gecorenra halgena;	life of the elect saints.
205	Eadige beoð þa ðe heofiað for þan ðe hi beoð gefrefrode; Ne beoð	Blessed are those who lament for they will be comforted. They are
	ða eadige þe for hynþum oððe lyrum hwilwendlicera hyðða heofiað:	not blessed who lament losses or hurts concerning transitory advantages
	ac þa beoð eadige þe heora synna bewepað for þan ðe se halga gast	but those are blessed who weep for their sins because the Holy Ghost
	hi gefrefrað: se þe deð forgyfennysse ealra synna: se is gehaten para-	will comfort them, who forgives all of their sins, who is called the Paraclete
	clitus bæt is frefriend: for þan ðe he gefrefrað þæra behreowsiendra	that is the comforter because he comforts their lamenting
210	heortan burh his gife;	hearts through his gift.
	Eadige beoð ða ðe sind ofhingrode & ofþyrste æfter rihtwisnysse	Blessed are those who hunger and thirst after righteousness for þan ðe hi beoð gefyllede; Se bið ofhingrod & ofþyrst æfter	because they will be filled. He is one who hungers and thirsts after rihtwisnysse se þe godes beboda lustlice gehyrð: & lustlicor mid	righteousness who eagerly hears God's commands and eagerly satisfies it
	weorce gefylð: se bið ðonne mid þam mete gefylled þe drihten embe	with deeds, who is then filled with the meat about which the Lord spoke: "My meat is that I work the will of my father" that is, righteousness.
215	3.6	1 (0) f 1 . T 1 .1 .21

nyss; Donne mæg he cweþan mid þam sealmscope; Drihten ic beo æteowed mid rihtwisnysse on þinre gesihþe: & ic beo gefylled þonne þin wuldor geswutelod bið;

Eadige beoð ða mildheortan for þan ðe hi begytað mildheortnysse;

Eadige beoð ða ðe earmra manna þurh mildheortnysse gehelpað for þan ðe him bið swa geleanod þæt hi sylfe beoð fram yrmþe alysede;

Then may he say with the psalmist. "Lord, let me be manifested as righteous in your sight and let me be filled with the manifestation of your glory."

Blessed are the mild-hearted because they will receive mild-heartedness because they will be so rewarded that they themselves will be redeemed from spræc; Min mete is bæt ic wyrce mines fæder willan bæt is rihtwis-

	Eadige beoð ða clænheortan for þan ðe hi geseoð god sylfne; Stunte	distress. Blessed are the clean-hearted because they will see God himself.
	sind þa ðe gewilniað god to geseonne mid flæsclicum eagum: þonne	They are foolish who wish to see God with a fleshly eye for he
	he bið mid þære heortan gesewen: ac heo is to clænsienne fram	will be seen with the heart. They who are clean from 225	leahtrum þæt heo god geseon mage; Swa swa eor ðlic leoht ne mæg	vice are those who may see God. Just as earthly light may not
	beon gesewen buton mid clænum eagum: swa eac ne bið god gesewen	be seen except with a clean eye, so also God will not be seen buton mid clænre heortan; Eadige beoð ða gesibsuman for þan ðe hi	except with a clean heart. Blessed are the peacemakers because they

Pg 4	$^{ m Pg}$ 494
228	beoð godes bearn gecigede; On sibbe is fulfremednys þær ðe nan	will be called sons of God. Peace is perfected when nothing
	þing ne þwyrað; For þi sind þa gesibsuman godes bearn for þan ðe	opposes anything. For the peacemakers are God's sons because they 230	nan þing on him ne wiþer að ongean gode; Gesibsume sind þa on him	do not struggle against God in any way. The peacemakers are those who sylfum þe ealle heora modes styrunga mid gesceade gelogiað & heora	arrange all the urgings of their mind with reason and flæsclican gewilnunga gewyldað swa þæt hi sylfe beoð godes rice; Þeos	control the fleshly wills so that they themselves will be God's kingdom.
	is seo sib þe is forgyfen on eorþan ðam mannum ðe beoð godes	This is the peace which is given on earth to the men who do God's willan; God ure fæder is gesibsum: witodlice for þy gedafenað ðam	will. God our father is peaceful; naturally it is befitting the
235	bearnum þæt hi heora fæder geefenlæcon;	children that they imitate their father.
	Eadige beoð ða ðe þoliað ehtnysse for rihtwisnysse for þan ðe	Blessed are those who suffer persecution for righteousness because heora is heofenan rice; Fela sind þa ðe ehtnysse þoliað for mislicum	theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Many are those who suffer persecution for intingum swa swa doð manslagan & sceaðan & gehwylce fyrnfulle ac	various causes like manslaughter and injuries and many wicked deeds but
	seo ehtnys him ne becymð to nanre eadinysse: ac seo ehtnys ana þe	this persecution does not led them to any blessings but only persecution
240	bið for rihtwisnysse geþolod becymð to ecere eadignysse; Nis to	which is for suffered for righteousness leads to eternal blessedness. Do not ondrædenne þwyrra manna ehtnys: ac ma to forþyldgienne swa swa	fear the persecution of perverse men but rather endure just as drihten to his leorningcnihtum cwæð; Ne ondræde ge eow þa ðe	the Lord said to his disciples: Do not fear those who can eowerne lichaman ofsleað for þan ðe hi ne magon eowere sawle	kill your body because they may not slay your soul
	ofslean: ac ondrædað god þe mæg ægþer ge sawle ge lichaman on	but fear God who may cast both soul and body into 245	hellesusle fordon; Ne sceole we þeah þa þwyran to ure ehtnysse	hellfire. We should not, though, provoke the perverse to persecute us
	gremian: ac swiþor gif hi astyrede beoð mid rihtwisnysse gestillan;	but it is better if those provoked will be calmed with righteousness.
	Gif hi þonne þære ehtnysse geswican nellað: selre us bið ðæt we	If they will not but persist in their persecution it is more fitting for us that ehtnysse þolian þonne we riht forlæton;	we suffer persecution than that we abandon the right.
	Eahta eadinyssa sind on ðisum godspelle geendebyrde; Is þeah gyt	Eight blessings are enumerated in this gospel. Though there is yet
250	an cwyde bæftan þe is geþuht swilce he sy se neogoða stæpe: ac he	one said after that might be thought to be the ninth step but it
	soðlice belimpþ to þære eahteoðan eadignysse: for þan ðe hi butu	truly concerns the eighth blessing because they both sprecað be ehtnysse for rihtwisnysse & for criste; Da eahta eadignyssa	speak concerning persecution for righteousness and for Christ. The eighth belimpað to eallum geleaffullum mannum & se æftemysta cwyde	blessing concerns all faithful men. The latter things speak thus þeah þe he synderlice to þam apostolon gecweden wære belimpð eac	although he particularly was saying them to the apostles they concern also

255	to eallum cristes lymum for þan ðe he nis neogoða ac fyligð þære	all the limbs of Christ because they are not a ninth but followed the eahteoþan eadignysse swa swa we ær sædon; Se Hælend cwæð	eighth blessing just as we said before. The Savior said
Pg 4	495
257	eadige ge beob donne man eow wyrigd & eower eht & ælc yfel ongean	You are blessed when men abuse you and persecute you and speak all
	eow sprecð leogende for me; Se bið eadig & gesælig þe for criste	manner of evil against you falsely because of me. One is blessed and happy
	bolað wyriunge & hospas fram leasum licceterum: for þan ðe seo lease	when one suffers rejection and insults from lying hypocrites because the 260	wyriung becymð þam rihtwisum to eadigre bletsunge;	lying rejection becomes, for the righteous, a fortunate blessing.
	Blissiað & fægniað for þan ðe eower med is menigfeald on	Rejoice and exult because your reward is manifold in heofenum; Geleaffullum gedafenað þæt hi wuldrian on gedrefed-	heaven. It is fitting for the faithful that they glory in tribulation nyssum for þan seo gedrefednys wyrhð geþyld & þæt geþyld afan-	because tribulation creates patience and that patience testing
	dunge & seo afandung hiht; Se hiht soblice ne bið næfre gescynd for	and testing hope. Hope truly is never confounded because 265	þan ðe godes lufu is agoten on urum heortum þurh ðone halgan gast	the love of God is found in our hearts through the Holy Spirit
	se be us is forgyfen; Be þysum cwæð se apostol iacobus; Eala ge mine	through whom we are forgiven. Concerning this the apostle James said:
	gebrobru: wenað eow ælcere blisse bonne ge beoð on mislicum	"Ho, my brothers, endure in all joy when you are in various costnungum: for þan ðe seo afandung eoweres geleafan is micele	sufferings because the testing of your faith is more deorwurþre þonne gold þe bið ðurh fyre afandod; Eft cwyð ðæt	precious than gold which is tested with fire." Also says the 270	halige gewrit læmene fatu beoð on ofne afandode: & rihtwise men on	holy writ "earthen vessels are tried in the oven and righteous men in gedrefednysse heora costnunge; Be þisum cwæð eac se hælend on	the tribulation of their suffering." Concerning this also the Savior spoke in oðre stowe to his leorningcnihtum; Gif þes middaneard eow hatað	another place to his disciples: "If this world hates you wite ge þæt he me hatode ær eow & gif hi min ehton þonne ehtað hi eac	know that it hated me before you and if they persecuted me then they will eower; Crist sylf wæs fram arleasum mannum acweald & swa eac his	also persecute you. Christ himself was killed by wicked men and also his 275	leorningcnihtas & martyras & ealle ða ðe gewilniað ar fæstlice to	disciples and martyrs and all those who wish to virtuously
	drohtnigenne on geleaffulre gelaðunge hi sceolon ehtnysse þolian	conduct themselves in the faithful church should endure persecution
	oððe fram ungesewenlicum deofle oððe fram gesewenlicum arleas-	either from unseen devils or from visible wicked
	um deofles leomum: ac þas hwilwendlican ehtnyssa oððe gedrefed-	limbs of the devil but these temporary persecutions or tribulations
	nyssa we sceolon mid gefean for cristes naman gebafian for ban ðe	we should with give consent for the name of Christ because 280	he þus behet eallum geþyldigum: blissiað & fægniað: efne eower med	he thus commanded all patience: Rejoice and exult because your reward is menigfeald on heofonum;	is manifold in heaven.
	We mihton þas halgan rædinge menigfealdlicor trahtnian æfter	We might treat this holy reading much more following
	augustines smeagunge: ac us twynað hwæðer ge magon maran deop-	Augustine's interpretation but we doubt whether you may profitably
	nysse þær on þear flice tocnawan: ac uton biddan mid inwear dre	understand more depth but let us bid with inward
285	heortan þone ælmihtigan wealdend: se þe us mid menigfealdre	hearts the almighty ruler, he who we with much

28	6	mærsunge ealra his halgena nu todæg geblissode: þæt he us getiþie	celebration applaud all his saints now today. May he grant us
		genihtsumnysse his mildsunge burh heora menifealdum bingræden-	the abundance of his mercy though their many intercessions
		um þæt we on ecere gesihðe mid him blissian swa swa we nu mid	that we may rejoice with them in the eternal sight just as we now honor hwilwendlicere þenunge hi wurþiað; Sy wuldor & lof hælendum	them with temporary service. Let there be glory and praise to the heavenly
29	0	criste se þe is angin & ende scyppend & alysend ealra halgena mid fæder &	Christ who is the beginning and end, creator and redeemer of all the saints mid halgum gaste a on ecnysse AMEN	with the Father and with the Holy Spirit forever and ever, Amen.

Catholic Homily I, 8: 3rd Sunday after Epiphany (Matt 8:1-13)

	DOMINICA III POST EPIPHANIA ⁸¹³ DOMINI	3 rd Sunday after the Epiphany of the Lord
	Cum descendisset iesus de monte: secute sunt eum turbe multe. et reliqua	When Jesus descended from the mountain a great multitude followed him and the rest.
5	Matheus se eadiga godspellere awrat on þissere godspellican rædinge þæt se hælend nyþereode of anre dune. & him fyligde micel meniu. Efne þa com sum hreoflig mann. & aleat wið ðæs hælendes þus cweþende. Drihten gif þu wilt þu miht me geclænsian. Se hælend astrehte his hand. & hine hrepode. & cwæð. Ic wille. And sy þu ge-	Matthew the blessed evangelist wrote in this gospel reading that the Savior descended from a mountain and a great many followed him. Just then came a certain leper and lay down before the Savior saying thus: "Lord, if you will, you could cleanse me." The Savior stretched out his hand and touched him and said, "I so will and let you be
10	clænsod. Da sona wearð his hreofla eall geclænsod. & he wæs gehæled. Da cwæð se hælend him to. Warna þæt ðu hit nanum menn ne secge: ac far nu to godes temple. & geswutela ðe sylfne. þam sacerde. & geoffra þine lac swa swa moyses bebead him on gewitnysse.	cleansed." Then immediately his leprosy was all cleansed and he was healed. Then the Savior said to him, "Take heed that you do not speak of this to any man but go now to God's temple and manifest yourself to the priest and offer the sacrifice just as Moses commanded in the writings.
15	Se lareow hægmon cwæð. on þissere trahtnunge. þæt seo dun þe se hælend of astah getacnode heofenan rice. of þam nyþer astah se ælmihtiga godes sunu: þa ða he underfeng ure gecynd & to mennis- cum menn geflæschamod wearð. to þy ðæt he mancyn fram deofles anwealde alysde. He wæs ungesewenlic & unþrowigendlic on his	The teacher Haymo said about this teaching that the mountain on which the Savior stood signified the kingdom of heaven from which the Son of the Almighty God came down when he received our nature and became enfleshed incarnate to men that he might redeem mankind from the power of the devil. He was invisible and impassible in his
20	gecynde: þa wearð he gesewenlic on urum gecynde. & þrowigendlic. Seo micele meniu þe him fyligde getacnode þa geleaffullan cristenan þe mid heora ðeawa stæpum drihtne fyligað. Witodlice we folgiað	Nature, then he became visible and sensible in our nature. The great many who followed him signified faithful Christians who with their conduct follow the steps of their Lord. Naturally we follow

23	cristes fotswaþum: gif we his gebysnungum mid godum weorcum geefenlæcað.	Christ's footsteps if we imitate his examples with good works.
25	Efne þa com sum hreoflig mann. & aleat wið þæs hælendes. þus cweþende. Drihten gif þu wilt þu miht me geclænsian. Se hælend astrehte his hand & hine hrepode. & cwæð. Ic wylle. & sy þu ge-	Just then came a certain leper and he lay down before the Savior saying thus: "Lord, if you will, you could cleanse me." The Savior stretched out his hand and touched him and said, "I so will and let you be

⁸¹³ The Old English text and line-numbering is from P.A.M. Clemoes, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text (EETS s.s. 17; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), 241-8.

	clænsod. Đa sona wearð his hreofla eall geclænsod. & he wæs	cleansed." Then immediately his leprosy was all cleansed and he was gehæled. On þissere dæde is geswutelod godes miht. & his eadmod-	healed. In this deed is manifested God's might and his humility.
30	nyss. Moyses æ forbead to hreppenne ænigne hreoflan. ac se	The law of Moses forbade anyone from touching a leper, but the eadmoda crist nolde hine forseon beah be he atelic wære: & eac	humble Christ would not scorn him though he was repulsive. He also geswutelode bæt he wæs hlaford bære ealdan æ. & na beow. Mihtig-	manifested that he was master of the old law and not its servant. Mightily lice he mihte mid his worde hine geclænsian buton hrepunge: ac he	he could with his words cleanse him but he touched so he manifested that geswutelode þæt his hrepung is swiðe halwende geleaffullum.	his touch is exceedingly saving to the faithful.
35	Geleafful wæs se hreofla þa ða he cwæð. drihten gif þu wilt. þu miht	Faithful was the leper when he said, "Lord, if you will, you could cleanse me geclænsian. Se Hælend andwyrde. Ic wylle. & þu beo geclænsod.	me." The Savior answered, "I so will and be you cleansed."
	Godes hæs soðlice is weorc: swa swa se sealmwyrhta cwæð. he hit	Truly this work is of God just as the palmist said, "He said it gecwæð. & þa gesceafta wæron geworhte: he bebead & hi wæron ge-	and the creation was worked; he commanded and they were shaped."
	sceapene.
40	On gastlicum andgite getacnode þes hreoflia man eall mancynn þe	In a spiritual sense, the leper signifies all mankind who
	wæs atelice hreoflig mid mislicum leahtrum on þam inran menn: ac	are repulsively leprous with manifold sin in the inner man, unless hit gebeah to cristes geleafan. & gleawlice undergeat þæt hit ne mihte	it submit to belief in Christ and prudently perceive that it may not þære sawle clænsunge onfon buton þurh drihten þe nane synne ne	receive soul cleansing except through the Lord who worked no crime worhte ne nan facn næs on his muðe gemet. Laðlic bið þæs hreoflian	nor was any deceit proper in his mouth. Hateful is the leprous
45	lic mid menigfealdum springum. & geswelle. & mid mislicum fag-	body with many ulcers and swellings and with manifold eruptions, nyssum: ac se inra mann þæt is seo sawul bið micele atelicor gif heo	but the inner man—that is the soul—is more repulsive if it mid mislicum leahtrum begriwen bið. We sceolon rihtlice gelyfan on	is steeped in manifold sins. We should rightly believe in crist þæt he ure sawle fram synna fagnyssum gehælan mæge: & we	Christ that he may heal our souls from eruptions of sins and we sceolon anrædlice his willan to þære fremminge biddan. His hand	should constantly bid his will to the progress. His hand

50	getacnað his mihte & his flæsclicnysse. Swa swa crist mid his handa	signifies his might and his fleshliness. Just as Christ healed the leper by hrepunge þone hreoflian gehælde: swa alysde he us fram ure sawla	touching with his hands, so he redeemed us from the offenses of our souls synnum burh anfenge ures flæsces. swa swa se witega issaias cwæð.	through taking on our flesh just as the prophet Isaiah said:
	Soðlice he sylf ætbræd ure adlunga. & ure sarnyssa he sylf bær.	"Truly he himself carried our infirmities and he himself bore our afflictions."
	Mid þam ðe he forbead þam gehæledum hreoflian þæt he hit	With this then he forbade the healed leper that he should speak of this
55	nanum men ne cydde: mid þam he sealde us bysne. þæt we ne	to anyone; with this he gave us an example that we should not sceolon na widmærsian ure weldæda. ac we sceolon onscunian mid	celebrate our good deeds but we should shun with an innweardre heortan bone ydelan gylp gif we hwæt lytles to gode	inward heart idle boasts if we do a little good.
	gedoð. Witodlice ne bið us mid nanum oþrum edleane forgolden gif	Naturally if we do good in order to boast we will not be rewarded
	we god for gilpe doð buton mid hellesusle. for þan ðe gilp is an	with any other reward except hell-fire because the boast is a

60	heafodleahter. Seo ealde æ bebead þæt gehwilc reoflig man gecome	deadly sin. The old law commanded that each leper must go to þam sacerde: & se sacerd sceolde hine fram mannum ascyrian gif	to the priest and the priest should separate him from men if he soòlice hreoflig wære. Gif he nære swutelice hreoflig. wære þonne	he truly were leprous. If he was not manifested as leprous, then be his dome clæne geteald. Gif se sacerd hine hreofline tealde. &	it would be announced that he was judged clean. If the priest announced
	godes miht hine syððan gehælde: þonne sceolde he mid lace his	him leprous, and God's power might heal him then he should thank
65	clænsunge gode þancian. Swa sceal eac se þe mid heafodleahtrum	God for his cleansing with sacrifices. So shall each who is leprous inwardly
	wiðinnan reoflig bið. cuman to godes sacerde & geopenian his digel-	with deadly sins come to God's priest and open his secrets
	nysse þam gastlican læce: & be his ræde. & fultume his sawle wunda	to the spiritual healer and by his counsel and his help treat by repenting his dædbetende gelacnian. Sume men wenað þæt him genihtsumie to	soul's wounds. Certain men think that it will suffice
	fulfremedum læcedome: gif hi heora synna mid onbryrdre heortan	completely for healing if they confess their sins with a contrite heart
70	gode anum andettað. & ne þurfon nanum sacerde geandettan gif hi	to God alone and they do not need to confess to any priest if they yfeles geswicað: ac gif heora wena soð wære þonne nolde drihten	wander into evil, but if their belief was true why would the Lord asendan bone be he sylf gehælde to bam sacerde mid ænigre lace. for	send him who he himself healed to the priest with any sacrifice? For þære ylcan gebysnunge. eac he asende paulum þone ðe he sylf of	another example of the same, he also sent Paul to the priest Annais whom heofonum gespræc: to þam sacerde annanian þus cweðende. Ga into	he himself spoke to from heaven saying thus: "Go into
75	þære ceastre: & þær ðe bið gesæd hwæt þe gedafenað to donne.	the city and there it will be said what it is fitting to be done.
	Ne gedyde se sacerd þone mann hreoflinne. oððe unhreoflinne: ac	The priest does not make a man leprous or unleprous, but

8 -	18211
77	he demde bæt he sceolde beon ascyred fram manna neawiste gif his	he deems that he should be separated from the society of men if his hreofla wyrsiende wære: oþðe betwux mannum wunian gif his hreofla	leprosy is getting worse or to dwell with men if his leprosy is godiende wære. Swa sceal don se gastlica sacerd. he sceal geriht-	getting better. So shall the holy priest do. He shall rectify
80	læcan godes folc & þone ascyrian. & amansumian fram cristenum	God's people and separate them and excommunicate from Christian mannum þe swa hreoflig bið on manfullum þeawum þæt he oþre mid	men the one so leprous in evil deeds that he will defile others with his yfelnysse besmit. Be þam cwæð se apostol paulus. Afyrsiað ðone	his evilness. Concerning this the Apostle Paul says: "Expel the yfelan fram eow: by læs be an wanhal scep ealle ba eowde besmite.	evil one from you; lest one ill sheep defile the whole herd."
	Gif his hreofla bið godigende: þæt is gif he yfeles geswicð & his	If his leprosy gets better, that is, if he wanders into evil and his 85	þeawas þurh godes ege gerihtlæcð. he hæbbe wununge betwux	habits are rectified through fear of God, he has a dwelling among cristenum mannum. oþ ðæt he ful hal sy on his drohtnungum. ♥ Se	Christian men until he might be fully healthy in his way of life. ▼ The godspellere cwæð þæt drihten ferde æfter þysum to anre byrig þe is	Evangelist says that the Lord went after this to a town which is gehaten capharnaum. þa genealæhte him to sum hundredes ealdor	called Capernaum when a certain leader of a hundred approached biddende & cweðende. Drihten. min cniht lið æt ham bedreda. & is	asking and saying, "Lord, my servant lies at home bedridden and is 90	yfele gebreatod. Drihten him andwyrde. Ic cume. & hine gehæle. Đa	threatened evilly." The Lord answered him, "I will come and heal him."
	andwyrde se hundredes ealdor. & cwæð. Drihten: neom ic wyrðe. þæt	Then the leader of a hundred answered and said, "Lord, I am not worthy
	ðu infare under minum hrofe. ac cweð ðin word. & min cniht bið	that you should come under my roof but say the word and my servant will gehæled. Ic eom an mann geset under anwealde hæbbende under me	be healed. I am a man set under authority having warriors under me cempan: & ic cwebe to bysum. far bu. & he færð. To obrum cum bu. &	and I say to this one, "Go, you." and he goes, to another, "Come, you,"

95	he cymð. To minum þeowum do þis. & he deð. Đa wundrode se	and he comes, to my servant, "Do this," and he does it. Then the Savior hælend þa ða he ðis gehyrde. & cwæð. to þære fyligendan meniu. Soð	marveled when he heard this and said to the many following, "Truly ic eow secge. ne gemette ic swa micelne geleafan on israhela beode.	I say to you, I have not found such great belief among the people of Israel.
	Ic secge eow to soban: þæt manega cumað fram eastdæle. & westdæle.	Truly I say to you that many will come from the east and west
	& gerestað hi mid abrahame þam heahfædere. & isaac. & iacob. on	and they will rest with Abraham the patriarch and Isaac and Jacob in the 100	neotenan nee. Da nean beam beoo aworpene mto pam yttram	kingdom of heaven. The sons of the kingdom will be cast into the outer þeostrum. þær bið wop & toða gebit. Ða cwæð eft se hælend to þam	darkness where there will be weeping and biting of teeth. Then after the hundredes ealdre. Far þe ham: & getimige þe swa swa þu gelyfdest. &	Savior said to the leader of a hundred, "Go home and it will happen just as se cniht wearð gehæled of þære tide.	you believe" and the servant was healed at that time.

104	Dæs hundredes ealldor genealæhte þam hælende: na healfunga. ac	The leader of a hundred approached the savior; he did not do so partially
105	fulfremedlice. He genealæhte mid micclum geleafan & mid sobre	but completely. He approached with great faith and with true eadmodnysse. & snoternysse. & soðre lufe. Micelne geleafan he hæfde	humility and wisdom and true love. He had great faith þa ða he cwæð: drihten. cweð ðin word & min cniht bið hal. Soðlice	when he said, "Lord, say the word and my servant will be healed." Truly he geswutelode micele eadmodnysse: mid þam ðe he cwæð. Drihten:	he manifested great humility with this when he said, "Lord, ne eom ic wyrðe þæt ðu infare under minre þecene. He hæfde micele	I am not worthy that you should come under my roof." He had great
110	snoternysse: þa ða he understod þæt crist is æighwær andwerd þurh	wisdom when he understood that Christ is present everywhere through godcundnysse: se þe lichamlice betwux mannum gesewenlic eode.	his divinity when he went bodily and visibly among men.
	Næs he bedæled þære soþan lufe. þa ða he bæd drihten for his	Nor did he rob true love when he bid the Lord for the health of þeowan hæle. Manega oðre menn bædon drihten: sume for heora	his servant. Many other men asked the Lord, some for their agenre hæle: sume for heora bearna. sume for leofra freonda: ac þes	own health, some for their children, some for beloved friends but this 115	ðegen bæd for his þeowan hælðe. mid soþre lufe: for þan ðe heo ne	thane asked for his servant's health with true love because he did not toscæt nænne be mæglicere sibbe. Drihten geseah þises þegenes	discriminate according to his own kinsmen. The Lord saw this thane's menigfealdan godnysse & cwæð. ic cume. & þinne cniht gehæle.	manifold goodness and said, "I will come and heal your servant."
	Iohannes se godspellere awrat. þæt sum undercyning com to criste &	John the Evangelist wrote that a certain under-king came to Christ and hine bæd þæt he ham mid him siþode. & his sunu gehælde. for þan ðe	asked him that he go home with him and heal his son because 120	he læig æt forðsiðe. Ða cwæð se hælend. to þam undercyninge.	he lay at the point of departure. Then the savior said to the under-king, gewend þe ham. Þin sunu leofað. He gelyfde þæs hælendes spræce. &	"Go home, your son lives." He believed the Savior's words and ham siðode. Ða comon his ðeignas him togeanes. & cyddon þæt his	went home. Then his thanes come toward him and said that his sunu gesund wære. He þa befran on hwilcere tide he gewyrpte. hi	son was healthy. He then asked at what time he recovered. They sædon. Gyrstondæig ofer midnedæg hine forlet se fefor. Da oncneow	said, "Yesterday at midday the fever left him. Then the father knew 125	se fæder þæt hit wæs seo tid. on þære ðe se hælend him to cwæð. far þe	that it was the time when the Savior said to him, "Go home, ham þin sunu leofað. Se cyning gelyfde þa on god. & eall his hired.	your son lives." The king believed in God and all his household.

	Drihten nolde gelaðod lichamlice siþian to þæs cyninges un-	The Lord would not though invited go bodily to the king's unhealthy
	truman bearne: ac unandwerd mid his worde hine gehælde. & he wæs	son but not present healed him with his word and he was ready gearo ungelaðod to siþigenne lichamlice mid þam hundredes ealldre.	uninvited to go bodily with the leader of a hundred.
130	Wel wat gehwa þæt cyning hæfð maran mihte. þonne ænig hun-	Well he knew that the king had more might than any leader of a
Pg 2
131	dredes ealdor: ac se ælmihtiga godes sunu geswutelode mid þære	hundred but the son of almighty God manifested with this dæde þæt we ne sceolon þa rican for heora ricetere wurðian: ac for	deed that we should not honor the rich for their riches but for menniscum gecynde. Ne we ne sceolon þa wanspedigan for heora	their human nature nor should we scorn the poor for their poverty
	hafenleaste forseon: ac we sceolon godes anlicnysse on him wurpian.	but we should honor God's likeness in them.
135	Se eadmoda godes sunu wæs gearo to geneosigenne þone þeowan	The humble son of God was ready to go to the servant
	mid his andwerdnysse: & he gehælde þone æðeling mid his hæse. Be	with his presence and he healed the prince with his command. Concerning þam cwæð se witega. Se healica drihten sceawað þa eadmodan. & þa	this said the prophet: "The exalted Lord observes the humble and he modigan feorran oncnæwð.	knows the haughty from afar."
	Drihten wundrode bæs hundredes ealdres geleafan: na swilce he	The Lord wondered at the faith of the leader of a hundred. Such he had 140	hine ær ne cube. se be ealle bing wat. ac he geswutelode mannum his	not known before, he who knows all things, but he manifested to men his geleafan mid herunge: þam ðe he wunderlic wæs. Hwanon com se	faith with praise; thus he wondered. Whence came faith
	geleafa þam ðegene. buton of cristes gyfe se þe hine siððan þysum	to the thane except from the grace of Christ when he heard these kinds of wordum herede. Soð ic eow secge: ne gemette ic swa micelne	words. Truly I say to you: I have not met such great faith geleafan on israhela þeode. Næs þis gecweden be þam heah-	faith among the people of Israel. This was not said concerning the 145	fæderum oððe witegum: ac be þam andwerdan folce. þe ða gyt næron swa	patriarchs or prophets but concerning the present people. They did not yet miccles geleafan.	have such great belief.
	Maria. & martha. wæron twa geswustru. swiþe on god belyfede: hi	Mary and Martha were two sisters exceedingly faithful to God; they cwædon to criste: drihten. gif þu her andwerd wære. nære ure broþer	said to Christ: "Lord, if you were present here our brother would not forbfaren. Des begen cwæð to criste: cweð þin word. & min cniht bið	have departed." This thane said to Christ: "Say the word and my servant
150	hal. Ic eom mann. under anwealde geset. hæbbende under me	will be healed. I am a man set under authority having soldiers under me cempan. & ic secge þisum far þu & he færð. To oþrum cum þu & he	and I say to this one, 'Go, you' and he goes; to another 'come you' and he cymð. To minum þeowan: do þis & he deð. Hu miccle swiþor miht	comes, to my servant 'Do this' and he does it. How much greater power
	þu ðe ælmihtig god eart þurh þine hæse gefremman swa hwæt swa ðu	do you have who are almighty God through your effective command just wilt. Drihten cwæð. Ic secge eow to sobon þæt manega cumað fram	as you will." The Lord said, "I say to you truly that many come from 155	eastdæle & westdæle. & gerestað hi mid abrahame þam heahfædere &	the east and the west and they rest with the patriarch Abraham and isaace & iacobe. on heofenan rice. [Das word sind lustbære to	Isaac and Jacob in the heavenly kingdom. These words are joyous to gehyrenne: & hi micclum ure mod gladiað. þæt manega cumað fram	hear and they are gladsome to our mind that many come from eastdæle middaneardes: & fram westdæle to heofenan rice: & mid þam	eastern regions of earth and from the west into the heavenly kingdom and

159	heahfæderum on ecere myrhðe rixiað. Đurh ða twegen dælas eastdæl	rule with the patriarchs in eternal joy. Through the two regions, the east
160	& westdæl sind getacnode þa feower hwommas ealles middaneardes:	and the west, are signified the four corners of all earth
	of þam beoð gegaderode godes gecorenan of ælcere mægðe to þæra	from which will be gathered the elect of God from all nations to dwell heahfædera wununge: & ealra halgena. Đurh eastdæl magon beon	with the patriarchs and all of the saints. Through the east may be getacnode þa ðe on geogoðe to gode bugað. for þan ðe on eastdæle is	signified those who converted to God in youth because the day's beginning þæs dæges angin. Đurh westdæl sind getacnode þa ðe on ylde to	is in the east. Through the west are signified those who returned to the 165	godes þeowdome gecyrrað for þan ðe on westdæle geendað se dæg.	service of God in old age because the day ends in the west.
	Des æfterfyligenda cwyde. is swiðe egeful. Da rican bearn beoð	The saying that follows after is very dreadful. The sons of the kingdom aworpene into þam yttrum þeostrum. þær bið wop & toþa gebit. Ða	are cast into the outer darkness where there is weeping and tooth biting.
	rican bearn sind þa iudeiscan: on þam rixode god. þurh þære ealdan	The sons of the kingdom are the Jews. God ruled over them through the
	æ: ac hi awurpon crist & his lare forsawon. & he awyrpð hi on þa yttran	old law but they rejected Christ and scorned his teaching and he cast them
170	þeostru. þær ðær bið wop & toþa gebit. Fela ricra manna geþeoð gode:	into the outer darkness where there is weeping and tooth biting. Many rich swa ðeah gif hi rihtwise beoð & mildheorte. Rice man wæs se heah-	men do good if they might be righteous and mildhearted. Rich men were fæder abraham: & dauid se mæra cyning: & zacheus se þe healfe his	the patriarch Abraham and David the great king and Zaccheus who gave æhta þearfum dælde. & mid healfum dæle forgeald be feowerfealdum	half his possessions to the poor and with half repaid fourfold swa hwæt swa he ær on unriht be anfealdum reafode. Þas rican &	what he robbed before in unrighteousness with simplicity. These rich and 175	heora gelican becumað þurh goddre gecyrrednysse to þam ecan rice.	their like came to the eternal kingdom through conversion to God who þe him næfre ne ateorað.	never wearied him.
	Da sind godes bearn gecigede þe hine lufiað swiþor þonne þisne	They are called sons of God who love him rather than this earth.
	middaneard: & þa sind þa rican bearn gecwedene þe heora heortan	and they are called the rich sons who root their hearts
	wyrtruman on þisum andwerdan life plantað swiþor ðonne on criste.	in this present life rather than planting them in Christ.
180	Swilce beoð on þeostrum aworpene. Đæt godspel cwyð on þam	Such will be cast into darkness. The Gospel says concerning the yttrum þeostrum. Þa yttran þeostru sind þæs lichaman blindnyssa	Outer darkness that the outer darkness is the blindness of the body wiðutan: þa inran þeostru sind þæs modes blindnyssa wiðinnan. Se	without, the inner darkness is the blindness of the mind within. He þe on þisum andweardan life is wiðinnan ablend swa þæt he næfð	who in this present life is blinded within so that he does not have

184	nan andgit ne hoge ymbe godes beboda: he bið ðonne eft wiðutan	any understanding of mind about the commands of God, he will afterward
185	ablend. & ælces leohtes bedæled. for þan ðe he ær his lif aspende.	be blinded without and be stripped of all light because of how he spent his buton godes gemynde. Đa earman forscyldegedan cwylmiað on ecum	life before unmindful of God. The condemning power torments in eternal fyre. & swa þeah þæt swearte fyr him nane lyhtinge ne deð. Wyrmas	fire and so that dark fire gives him no light. Worms
	toslitað heora lichaman. mid fyrenum toþum: swa swa crist on his	rend their bodies with fiery teeth just as Christ said in his godspelle cwæð. Ðær næfre heora wyrm ne swylt: ne heora fyr ne bið	gospel: Where their worm never dies and their fire will not be

190	adwæsced. Þær beoð þonne geferlæhte on anre susle: þa ðe on life on	quenched. There they will be associated in each torment who in life were mandædum geþeodde wæron: swa þæt ða manslagan togædere	associated in evil deeds—thus the murderers will suffer together eternally ecelice on tintregum cwylmiað: & forliras mid forlirum: gitseras. mid	in torture and adulterers with adulterers, misers with gitserum: sceaban mid sceabum: þa forsworenan. mid forsworenum.	misers, criminals with criminals, the foresworn with the foresworn, on þam bradum fyre buton ælcere geendunge forwurðað. Ðær bið	perishing in the spacious fire without any end. There will be 195	wop & toða gebit: for þan ðe þa eagan tyrað on þam micclum bryne: &	weeping and tooth biting because the eyes will tear in the great burning þa teð cwaciað eft on swiþlicum cyle. Gif hwam twynige be þam	and the teeth chatter from the extreme cold. If one doubts concerning the gemænelicum æriste. þonne understande he þisne drihtenlican	universal resurrection then he should understand the this dominical
	cwyde. þæt ðær bið soð ærist. þær ðær beoð wepende eagan. &	saying that they will truly arise so that the eye will weep and the cearcigende teð.	teeth chatter.
200	Drihten cwæð to þam hundredes ealdre. Far þe ham: & getimige þe.	The Lord said to the leader of a hundred: "Go home and it will happen swa swa ðu gelyfdest: & his cniht wearð gehæled of þære tide. Be	just as you believe" and the servant was healed at that time. Concerning þisum is to understandenne hu miccllum þam cristenum men his	this is to understand how greatly Christian men benefit from their
	agen geleafa fremige bonne obres mannes swa micclum fremode.	own belief when other men profit so greatly.
	Witodlice for þæs hundredes ealdres geleafan wearð se bedreda	Manifestly the bedridden servant was healed by the leader of a hundred's
205	cniht gehæled. Geleafa is ealra mægna fyrmest. buton þam ne mæig	belief. Belief is the foremost power of all without which no man may nan man gode lician: & se rihtwisa leofað be his geleafan. Uton	please God for the righteous one lives by his faith. Let us come
	gelyfan on þære halgan þrynnysse & on soþre annysse: þæt se ælmihtiga	believe in the holy trinity and in true unity that is the Almighty
	fæder & his sunu þæt is his wisdom: & se halga gast se þe is heora begra	Father and his Son who is his wisdom and the Holy Ghost who is both
	lufu & willa: þæt hi sind þry on hadum: & on namum. & an god on anre	their love and will; that they are three in person and in name and one 210	godcundnysse æfre wuniende buton anginne. & ende. AMEN.	God in their divinity ever living without beginning or end. Amen.

On page 247 after l. 165, Ælfric added another paragraph that appears in manuscripts N and Q. It is contained in Appendix B, pg 533.

	Mine gebroðra understandað þis. manega cumað fram eastdæle &	My brothers, understand this. Many will come from east and west westdæle & gerestað hi mid abrahame & isaace & iacobe on heofonan	and they will rest with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the heavenly rice. Ne mæg nan eorðlic cyning cynelic lybban. buton he hæbbe	kingdom. No earthly king may live like a king unless he has ðegenas. & swa gelogodne hired swa his cynescipe gerisan mæge.	thanes and so places his household so his kingship may be fitting.
5	Hwæt wenst ðu la. nele se ælmihtiga cyning þe gesceop heofonas &	What do you think? Would not the Almighty King who shaped the heavens eorðan habban ormætne hired þe him mid rixie. Fela he wile habban	and the earth have a boundless household who rule with him. He will have of manncynne to his heofonlican hirede. & gehwa hæfð ðær þone	many of mankind for his heavenly household and whoever has there this weorðscipe be ðam ðe he her on worulde geearnode.	honor by which he has earned here in the world.

CATHOLIC HOMILY II, 39: FOR PLURAL VIRGINS (MATT 25:1-13)

	IN NATALE SANCTARUM UIRGINUM.814	For Plural Virgins
	Simile est regnum celorum decem uirginibus. Et reliqua. Se hælend sæde gelomlice bigspel be gehwilcum ðingum his	The kingdom of heaven is like ten virgins The savior frequently told parables concerning many things leorningcnihtum. Nu cwæð he on ðisum bigspelle. þæt heo-	to his disciples. Now he speaks in this parable that ¹ the
5	fenan rice wære gelic tyn mædenum. þa genamon heora leoht-	kingdom of heaven is like ten maidens who took their lamps
5	fatu and eodon togeanes ðam brydguman. and þære bryde; Þæra mædena wæron fif stunte. and fif snotore; Witodlice ða fif stuntan namon heora leohtfatu. and nænne ele to ðære lihtinge. and ða snoteran genamon ele on heora fætelsum. mid heora	And went before the bridegroom and the bride. ² Of these maidens five were foolish and five wise. ³ Naturally the five foolish took their lamps and no more oil for their lights ⁴ but the wise took oil in their vessels with their leohtfætum; Đa elcode se brydguma mid his tocyme. and ða	lamps. ⁵ Then the bridegroom and his coming were delayed and the 10	mædenu begunnon to hnappienne. oð þæt hi ealle slepon;	maidens began to doze until they were all asleep.
	Đa on middere nihte wearð clypung gehyred. Efne her cymð	⁶ Then, in the middle of the night, a shout was heard: "Behold, the se brydguma. Gað him togeanes; Þa arison ealle ða mædenu	bridegroom has come; go to meet him." ⁷ Then all the maidens arose and gearcodon heora leohtfatu. and þa stuntan cwædon to ðam	and prepared their lamps and 8the foolish said to the snoterum; Syllað us sumne dæl eoweres eles. for ðan þe ure	wise: "Give us a portion of your oil because our 15	leohtfatu sind acwencte; Da snoteran mædenu andwyrdon þam	lamps are quenched." ⁹ The wise maidens answered the stuntum. and cwædon; Di læs ðe hit ne genihtsumige us and	foolish and said: "There is not enough of it for us and
	eow. farað to ðam syllendum and bicgað eow ele; Þa mid ðam	for you; go to the seller and buy yourselves oil." ¹⁰ Then with that ðe hi ferdon ymbe ðone ceap. þa com se brydguma. and ða fif	they went around the market. Then the bridegroom came and the five mædenu þe mid ðam leohte gearwe wæron. ferdon mid him	maidens who were prepared with their lights went with him
20	into ðam giftum. and þæt geat wearð belocen; Ða æt nextan	into the marriage and the door was locked. ¹¹ Then at last
	comon ða stuntan mædenu. and clypodon to ðam brydguman;	the foolish maidens came and called to the bridegroom:
	Hlaford. hlaford. hat geopenian þæt geat; He andwyrde; Soð	"Lord, lord, open the door." 12He answered "Truly ic eow secge. ne cann ic eow; Waciað eornostlice. for ðan ðe ge	I say to you, I do not know you." ¹³ Keep watch earnestly because you nyton þone dæg ne ða tide; Þis godspel is nu anfealdlice	do not know the day nor the time. This gospel is now simply 25	gesæd mid digelum andgite. Ac Augustinus se wisa us onwreah	said but with obscure meanings. Moreover Augustine the wise man explains to us

⁸¹⁴ The Old English text and line-numbering is from Malcolm Godden, Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The Second Series, Text, (EETS s.s. 5; London: Oxford University Press, 1979), 327-34.

26	ða deopnysse. and eac se halga Gregorius ymbe ðis ylce awrat	its deepness and also the holy Gregory wrote concerning this same text
20
	bus cwedende; Us is to gewitenne bæt gelomlice on haligre	saying thus: It is known to us that frequently in holy spræce is ðeos andwerde gelaðung gehaten heofenan rice.	scripture the present church is called the kingdom of heaven
20	swa swa se hælend on sumere stowe cwæð; Mannes bearn asent	just as the savior said in another place: "The Son of Man sent
30	his englas. and gegaderað of his rice ealle æswicunga; Witodlice	his angels and gathered from his kingdom all of the offences." Naturally on ðam upplican rice is healic sib. and ðær ne bið nan æswicung	in the celestial kingdom is profound peace and there are not any offences
	gemet. ðe mage beon ðonon gegaderod; Đeos andwerde	which may be gathered out of there. This present gelaðung þe underfehð yfele and gode. is wiðmeten ðam tyn	church which contains evil and good is compared to ten mædenum. ðæra wæron fif stunte. and fif snotere; On fif	maidens of whom five were foolish and five wise. Of the five 35	andgitum swa swa we eow oft sædon. gehwilc man leofað	senses (just as we have often told you), each man experiences them
	þe his hæle hæfð; Þæt is Gesihð. and Hlyst. Swæcc. and Stenc.	who has his health. They are sight and hearing, taste and smell and hrepung; Đas fif andgitu gif hi beoð getwyfylde. ðonne	and touch. These five senses, if they are doubled, then they gefyllað hi tynfeald getel; Nu is for ði seo halige gelaðung	are calculated as ten. Now therefore the holy church
	gelic tyn mædenum. for ðan ðe seo gelaðung is gegaderod of	is like ten maidens because the church is gathered from 40	ægðres hades mannum. þæt is werhades. and wifhades; Ælc	both kinds of people, that is men and women. Each ðæra manna ðe hine forhæfð fram unalyfedlicere gesihðe. fram	person who restrains themselves from illicit sights, from unalyfedlicere heorcnunge. fram unalyfedlicum swæcce. fram	illicit sounds, from illicit tastes, unalyfedlicum stence. fram unalyfedlicere hrepunge. se hæfð	from illicit smells, from illicit touches, he has mædenes naman. for ðære anwalhnysse; Gif god is and halwend-	the name of maiden on account of his self-possession. If it is good and 45	lic to forhæbbenne fram unalyfedlicum styrungum and for ði	healthy to refrain from illicit stirrings and for hæfð ælc cristen sawul mædenes naman. Hwi sind ðonne þa fif	each Christian soul to have the name of maiden, then why are five underfangene. and þa fif aworpene; Ealle hi hæfdon leohtfatu.	received and five rejected? All of them had lamps ac hi næfdon ealle ele; Se ele getacnað þa soðan lufe. seo ðe	but not all had oil. The oil signifies true love which næfre ne ateorað; Eles gecynd is. þæt he wile oferstigan ælcne	never fails. The quality of oil is that it will overcome all 50	wætan; Ageot ele uppon wæter. oððe on oðrum wætan. se ele	fluids. When oil is poured upon water or on other liquids, the oil
	flyt bufon; Ageot wæter uppon ðone ele. and se ele abrecð up	floats above. When water is poured upon oil and the oil raises up and swimð bufon; Geot ðu ðone ele ær. geot ðu siððan. æfre	and swims above it. When you pour oil either before or after he oferswið þone oðerne wætan. and seo soðe lufu næfre ne	it always overcomes the other liquids and likewise true love never fylð; On ðære forhæfednysse fram unalyfedlicum styrungum is	fails. In their restraint from illicit stirrings they have

Pg 329

55	mædenes nama gehæfd. and on ðam leohtfatum sind ða godan	the name of maiden and the lamps signify weorc getacnode. be ðam weorcum cwæð ure drihten on his	good works. Our Lord spoke concerning such works in his godspelle; Sic luceat lux uestra coram hominibus. ut uideant	gospel. So let your light shine before men that they may see opera uestra bona. et glorificent patrem uestrum qui in celis est;	your good works and glorify your father who is in heaven.
	Þæt is on urum gereorde; Scine eower leoht ætforan mannum.	That is in our tongue, "Let your light shine before men

60	swa þæt hi geseon eowere godan weorc. and wuldrian eowerne	so that they see your good works and glorify your fæder þe on heofenum is; Eft he cwæð; Beon eower lendena ymb-	father who is in heaven. Then he said, "Keep your loins gyrde. and eower leohtfatu byrnende; On ðam ymbgyrdum lend-	girded and your lamps burning. By the girding of the loins enum is se mægðhad. and on ðam byrnendum leohtfatum sind	is chastity and by burning lights are ða godan weorc to understandenne; Ða snoteran mædenu namon	good works understood. The wise maidens bring 65	ðone ele on heora leohtfatum. for ðan ðe hi hæfdon þæt gode	oil for their lamps because they have that good
	ingehyd on heora heortan. þæt hi woldon gode anum gecweman.	intent in their hearts that they would please the good alone and na cepan dysegra manna herunge. swa swa se apostol	and not seek after the praise of ignorant men just as the apostle
	Paulus cwæð; Ure wuldor is seo gecyðnys. ures ingehydes;	Paul said: "Your glory is the testimony of your intent."
	Eft cwæð se sealmwyrhta be ðære halgan gelaðunge. þæt eall	The Psalmist also said concerning the holy church that all 70	hire wuldor is wiðinnan on godes gesihðe. na on ydelra manna	her glory is within God's sight not the praise of frivolous men.
	herunge; Sume men sind swa bepæhte ðurh ydelne gylp. þæt	Some men are so seduced by frivolous boasting that
	hi doð for manna herunge swa hwæt swa hi doð. swiðor ðonne	they do for the praise of men what they ought to do for godes lufon. ðonne sind hi stunte. þæt hi cepað þæs ydelan	for the love of God; then they are foolish for they seek after the frivolous hlysan. na þæs ecan edleanes; Be swilcum cwæð se hælend	sounds not the eternal rewards. Concerning such the savior said
75	on sumere stowe; Amen dico uobis. receperunt mercedem	in a certain place: Truly I say to you, they have received their reward.
	suam; Soð ic eow secge. hi underfengon heora mede. þæt is se	Truly I say to you, they have received their reward. That is the ydela hlisa ðe hi lufodon; Habbon hi ðone woruldhlisan þe hi	frivolous fame which they love. They have this world's fame which they sohton. na ða ecan mede þe hi ne rohton; Nis na gewunelic þæt	sought rather than the eternal reward which did not interest them. It is not customary that mægðhad si gecweden on sinscipe. ac swa ðeah ðær is þæs	chastity might refer to the married state but nevertheless there is 80	geleafan mægðhad. þe wurðað ænne soðne god. and nele	chastity of faith which worships only the true God and will not forligerlice to leasum hæðengylde bugan; Eal seo gelaðung ðe	stoop impurely to false idolatry. All the church which stent on mædenum. and on cnapum. on ceorlum and on wifum.	abides with respect to maidens and youths and men and women
	eal heo is genamod to anum mædene. swa swa se apostol	all of them are named as a maiden just as the apostle
	Paulus cwæð. to geleaffullum folce; Disponsaui uos uni uiro	Paul said to faithful people I married you to one man

- 0 -	18000
85	uirginem castam. exhibere christo; Pæt is on englisc. Ic bewed-	to present a chaste virgin to Christ. That is in English, "I married
	dode eow anum were. þæt ge gearcian an clæne mæden criste;	you to a single man that you might be presented a chaste maiden for Christ.
	Nis ðis na to understandenne lichamlice. ac gastlice; Crist is se	This is not understood bodily but spiritually. Christ is the clæna brydguma. and eal seo cristene gelaðung is his bryd.	chaste bridegroom and the whole Christian church is his bride
	þurh ða he gestrynð dæghwomlice mennisce sawla to his	through which he daily acquires the souls of men for his 90	heofenlican rice; Seo gelaðung is ure modor and clæne mæden.	heavenly kingdom. The church is our mother and chaste maiden for ðan þe we beoð on hire geedcynnede to godes handa. þurh	because we are regenerated in her to God's hands through geleafan and fulluht; Đa mædenu woldon gan togeanes ðam	belief and baptism. The maidens would go to meet the brydguman. mid heora leohtfatum; We gað togeanes criste.	bridegroom with their lamps. We go to meet Christ ðonne we andbidiað mid geleafan his tocymes; Ac he elcað his	when we await his coming with belief. But he delayed his

95	tocymes. and on ðære anbidunge þa mædenu hnappiað. and	coming and in their waiting the maidens drowsed and slapað; Gehwær on halgum bocum is se gemænelica deað	slept. Constantly in the holy books death is commonly slæpe wiðmeten. swa swa se ðeoda lareow cwæð; De dormienti-	compared with sleep just as the teacher of the nations said: Concerning the bus autem. nolo uos ignorare fratres; Mine gebroðra. Ic nelle	sleeping, however, I do not wish you to be ignorant, brothers. My brothers, I do not þæt ge nyton be ðam slapendum. þæt is be ðam deadum; Hwi	wish that you be ignorant concerning those who sleep (that is, concerning those who are dead.) Why 100	sind ða deadan slapende gecwedene. buton for ðan þe hi	are the dead called the sleeping except that they sceolon arisan geedcucode. þurh ðone ælmihtigan scyppend;	should arise regenerated by the Almighty Creator?
	Beon ða mædenu snotere beon hi stunte. ealle hi moton slapan	Be the maidens wise or be they foolish, they all sleep on ðam gemænelicum deaðe. ær ðan ðe se brydguma crist	together in death before the bridegroom Christ
	cume to ðam micclum dome; Media autem nocte clamor	comes at the great judgment. In the middle of the night a shout
105	factus est. ecce sponsus uenit. exite obuiam ei; On middre	was made: "Behold, the bridegroom comes; go forth to meet him." In the middle nihte wearð clypung gehyred. efne her cymð se brydguma.	of the night a shout was heard: "Behold, the bridegroom has come; go to gað him togeanes; Hwæt getacnað seo midniht. buton seo deope	meet him." What does midnight signify except deep nytennys. for ðan ðe seo geendung þyssere worulde cymð	ignorance because the ending of this world comes þonne men læst wenað. swa swa se apostol cwæð; Dies domini	when men least expect just as the apostle said: The day of the Lord
110	sicut fur in nocte. ita ueniet; Drihtnes dæg cymð. swa swa	as a thief in the night so it will come. The day of the Lord comes just as ðeof on niht; Oft cweðað men. efne nu cymð domes dæg. for	a thief in the night. Often men say: "Behold, now comes doomsday ðan ðe ða witegunga sind agane. þe be ðam gesette wæron; Ac	because the wise men are gone as it was written." But gefeoht cymð ofer gefeohte. gedrefednys ofer gedrefednysse.	strife comes after strife; tribulation after tribulation
	eorðstyrung ofer eorðstyrunge. hungor ofer hungre. þeod ofer	earthquake after earthquake; famine after famine; nation
115	ðeode. and þonne gyt ne cymð se brydguma; Eac swilce þa six	after nation and yet the bridegroom has not yet come. Thus each of six ðusend geara fram adame beoð geendode. and ðonne gyt elcað	thousand years since Adam has ended and yet the bridegroom delays.
	se brydguma; Hu mage we þonne witan hwænne he cymð?	How may we know when he comes?

Pg 331

 18	18 331
118	Swa swa he sylf cwæð. on middre nihte; Hwæt is on middre	Just as he himself said—in the middle of the night. What is the middle nihte. buton þonne ðu nast. and þu his ne wenst ðonne cymð	of the night except when you do not know and you do not expect his 120	he; Nis nan gesceaft þe cunne ðone timan þyssere worulde	coming? No one is able to know the time of this world's geendunge. buton gode anum; Hwæt is se hream þe on middre	ending except God alone. What is the outcry in the middle nihte cymð ætforan ðam brydguman. buton ðæra engla	of the night that comes before the bridegroom but the angels blawung. swa swa se apostol awrat; In ictu oculi. in nouissima	blowing just as the apostle wrote: In the twinkling of an eye, at the last tuba; Canet enim tuba. Et cetera; On anre preowthwile. on	trumpet; indeed the trumpet soundsIn a moment, at 125	ðære endenextan byman. Seo byme soðlice blæwð. and ða	the last trumpet, the trumpet truly blows and the

	deadan arisað ungebrosnode. and we beoð awende to ecum	dead arise uncorrupted and we will be turned into eternal ðingum on þam lichaman. swa swa we nu sind on ðære sawle;	things in body just as we now are in soul.
	Be ðisum cwæð se hælend; Se tima cymð þæt ealle ða ðe on	Concerning this the savior said, "The time comes that all who byrgenum beoð gehyrað godes suna stemne. and hi forðgað.	are in the grave will hear the voice of the son of God and they shall come forth
130	þa ðe god worhton to lifes æriste. þa soðlice ðe yfel worhton to	those who worked good rising to life then truly those who worked evil geniðerunge æriste;	rising to condemnation.
	Tunc surrexerunt omnes uirgines ille. et ornauerunt lam-	Then arose all the virgins and trimmed pades suas; Pa arison ealle ða mædenu. and gegearcodon	their lamps. Then all the maidens arose and they prepared heora leohtfatu; Đa mædenu arison. for ðan ðe ða gecorenan.	their lamps. The maidens arose because both the elect
135	and ða wiðercorenan beoð ealle awrehte of þæs deaðes	and the rejected will all awake from the sleep
	slæpe; Hi gearcodon heora leohtfatu. þæt is hi gearciað hi	of death. They prepared their lamps; that is, they prepare sylfe. to agyldenne gescead þam cumendum deman. heora	themselves for the reckoning of offences at the coming judgment of their dæda; Đæra stuntra mædena leohtfatu beoð acwencte on þæs	deeds. The foolish maidens' lamps will be quenched in the deman tocyme. and hi nan edlean æt gode nabbað. for ðan ðe	coming judgment and they will not receive the reward of the good because 140	hi underfengon manna herunga. þe him licodon; Þa stuntan	they sought the praise of men which pleased them. The foolish mædenu cwædon to ðam snoterum; Syllað us sumne dæl	maidens said to the wise: "Give us a portion eoweres eles. for ðan þe ure leohtfatu sind acwencte; Hi ge-	of your oil because our lamps are quenched." They sawon þæt hi sylfe wiðinnan æmtige wæron. þæs godan ingehy-	saw that they were empty within of good intentions
	des. and for di sohton gewitnysse widutan; Hi wæron gewunode	and thus they sought testimony from without. They were used 145	to oðra manna herunge. and þæs gewilnodon swa swa heora	to the praise of other men and they desired just what they gewuna wæs. swilce hi cwædon. Nu ge geseoð þæt we æt us	were used to, thus they said, "Now you see that we

147	sylfum naht nabbað. secgað nu hwæt ge be urum weorcum	have nothing for ourselves; say now what you saw concerning our works."
	gesawon; Đa snoteran mædenu andwyrdon ðam stuntum. and	The wise maidens answered the foolish and cwædon; Þi læs ðe hit ne genihtsumige us and eow. farað to	said, "There is not enough of it for us and for you; go to the 150	ðam syllendum. and bicgað eow ele; Soðlice on ðam micclum	seller and buy yourselves oil." Truly in the great dome. ælcum ænlipium men ðincð to lytel his agen ingehyd	judgment each solitary man thinks too little about the testimony of him to gewitnysse. þeah ðe he ne sceole oðrum to gewitnysse	his own intentions for he cannot use the testimony of others.
	beon; Ne ðam heofenlican deman nis nan neod æniges mannes	In the heavenly judgment there is not the pleasure of another man's gewitnysse. se ðe þurhsihð ælces mannes heortan. and gewiss-	testimony; it penetrates each man's heart and lays 155	licor wat þæs mannes mod þonne he sylf; Hi cwædon. farað	plain a man's mind about himself. They said, "Go to ðam syllendum. and bicgað eow ele; Nis ðis na ræd. ac is	to the seller and buy yourselves oil." This is not counsel but is edwit. swilce hi cwædon; Ge ðe wæron gewunode to under-	reproach which they spoke. You who used to seek after fonne manna herunga for eowerum godum weorcum. farað to	the praise of men for your good works, go to

	ðam lyffeterum þe eow ær leaslice olæhton. habbað æt him	the flatterers who falsely flattered you before; get from them
160	swa hwæt swa ge magon. ne sylle we eow nan ðing; Ge noldon	what you may but we will not give you anything. You would not habban eowerne ele wiðinnan. þæt is ge noldon gode lician on	have your own oil within; that is, you would not please God with godum ingehyde. ac for ðæra idelra manna herunge ge worhton	good intentions but you worked praiseworthy works for the praise of herigendlice weorc. farað nu and bicgað. ne sylle we eow nænne;	frivolous men. Go now and buy; we will not give you anything.
	Þa mid ðam þe hi ferdon ymbe ðone ceap. ða com se bryd-	Then with that they went around the market. Then the bridegroom came
165	guma. and ða fif mædenu ðe mid þam leohte gearwe wæron.	and the five maidens who were prepared with their lights
	ferdon mid him into ðam giftum. and þæt geat wearð belocen;	went with him into the marriage and the door was locked.
	Ne bohton hi nænne ele. ne hi ne gemetton nænne ðe him ða	They did not buy any oil nor did they obtain any from them who ele syllan wolde; Nis nan man swa dyrstig on þam micclum	would sell oil. No man should be so bold in the great dome. þæt he durre oðerne betellan. ðonne adumbiað þa ydelan	judgment that he presume on another's account when frivolous
170	lyffeteras. þe ær ðone ele sealdon. þæt wæron þa smeðan	flatterers will be silent who previously sold oil that was smooth lyffetunga; Witodlice se rihtwisa on ðam dæge forhtað. ðeah ðe	flattery. Naturally the righteous will be afraid that day though they he ðurh god ingehyd Gode gelicode. þeah hwæðere cwacað þæt	pleased God with good intentions whether they speak their ingehyd bær afyrht for ðam micclum brogan. bæs gemænan	intentions from their fear at the great terror of the universal domes; Đa æt nextan comon ða stuntan mædenu. and clypodon	judgment. Then at last the foolish maidens came and called 175	to ðam brydguman; Hlaford. Hlaford. hat geopenian þæt geat;	to the bridegroom: "Lord, lord, open the door."
	Drihten cwæð on oðrum godspelle; Cnuciað. and eow bið	The Lord said in another gospel: "Knock and it will be geopenod; Ac we sceolon nu cnucian. and infær biddan to	opened to you." But we should knock now and seek to enter into heofenan rice. na ðonne; Nu is mildheortnysse tima.	the heavenly kingdom, not then. Now is the time of mercy

179	and ðonne bið domes tima; Se ðe nele nu on mildheortnysse timan	and then will be the time of judgment. The one who does not now
180	hine sylfne gerihtlæcan þurh soðe behreowsunge. þam bið	justify himself with true sorrowing in the time of mercy, then the heofenes geat belocen on ðæs domes timan; Eala micel modes	gate of heaven will be locked in the time of judgment. Ho! What great biternys is on ðam worde. þæt geat wæs belocen; Hi behreowso-	grief of mind is in that statement that the gate was locked. They sorrowed don þæt hi ele næfdon. ac heora behreowsung wæs to lætt;	that they did not have oil but their sorrowing was too late.
	Sume gedwolmen cwædon þæt seo halige Maria cristes	Some heretics say that the holy Mary, Christ's 185	modor. and sume oðre halgan sceolon hergian æfter ðam dome	mother and certain other saints will each seize their portion after the ða synfullan of ðam deofle. ælc his dæl. Ac þis gedwyld asprang	judgment of the sinful from the devil but this heresy sprang of ðam mannum. þe on heora flæsclicum lustum symle licgan	from men who wished to remain continually in the lusts of their flesh
	woldon. and noldon mid earfoðnyssum þæt ece lif geearnian;	and would not earn eternal life with hardships.
	Ne hopige nan man to ðyssere leasunge. Nele seo eadige Maria	No man should cling to these lies. Neither the blessed Mary 190	ne nan oðer halga lædan ða fulan. and þa manfullan. and ða	nor any other saint will take the impure or the wicked or the arleasan. þe æfre on synnum þurhwunodon. and on synnum	lawless who constantly dwell in sin and end in sin geendodon. into ðam clænan huse heofenan rices myrhðe. Ac	into the dwelling of the joy of the kingdom of heaven. But

	hi beoð deoflum gelice. and on ecnysse mid deoflum on helle	they will lie with the devils and eternally with the devils be tormented fyre cwylmiað; Ne mæg eal middaneard anum ðæra geðingian.	in hell fire. Nor may anyone in all the earth intercede thus 195	þe crist þus to cweð; Discedite a me maledicti in ignem aeter-	for Christ said thus: Go away from me, accursed ones, into the eternal fire
	num. qui preparatus est diabolo et angelis eius; Þæt is. gewitað	which was prepared for the devil and his angels. That is, "Go away
	fram me ge awyrigedan into ðam ecan fyre. þe ðam deofle is	from me you accursed into the eternal fire which is prepared gegearcod. and his awyrigedum englum; Da stuntan mædenu	for the devil and his accursed angels. The foolish maidens clypodon. hlaford. hlaford. hat geopenian us þæt geat. and se	said "Lord, lord, open the door to us." And the 200	maiora and wyrac, 500 ie cow seege. He cann ie cow, riwae ne	Lord answered: "Truly I say to you, I do not know you." How does he not cann. se de ealle ding cann? He ne cann nænne leahter. and hi	know who knows all things? He cannot know any vice and they wæron mid leahtrum afyllede; Drihten ne oncnæwð hi. for	were filled with vice. The Lord did not acknowledge them because ðan ðe hi sind oðre. oþre hi wæron; Hwæt is to cweðenne ne	they should be other than they were. What is it to say "I cann ic eow. buton þæt ic ne worhte eow ðyllice; Ne cann	do not know you" except that I did not create you thus. The Lord 205	drihten leahtras. ac he gewitnað leahtras; Đæt godspel belicð	does not acknowledge vices but he punishes vices. That gospel states
	bus. waciað eornostlice. for ðan þe ge nyton þone dæg. ne ða	thus: Keep watch earnestly because you do not know the day
	tid; Nat nan man þyssere worulde geendunge. ne furðon his	nor the time. No man knows this world's ending nor even

208	agene geendunge; Menig man wolde bone maran dæl his lifes	his own ending. Many men would spend a greater portion of his life
	aspendan on his lustum. and ðone læssan dæl on dædbote. gif	in his lusts and a smaller portion in penitence if 210	he wiste hwænne he geendian sceolde; Us is bedigelod ure	he knew when his end would be. Our end is a mystery to us geendung. to ði þæt we sculon symle us ondrædan. ðone	so that we should constantly fear the endenextan dæg. bone ðe we ne magon næfre foresceawian;	last day for we can never foresee it.
	We sceolon for di wacian on ure heortan. and on geleafan. We	We should keep watch for it in our hearts and in faith. We sceolon wacian on hihte and on soore lufe. We sceolon wacian	should keep watch in hope and in true love. We should keep watch
215	on godum weorcum. and don buton ydelum gylpe gif we	in good works and do what little good we may without frivolous boasts
	hwæt lytles to gode gedoð. Þæt we moton faran into heofenan	that we might go into the kingdom
	rice mid ðam clænan brydguman hælende criste. Se ðe leofað	of heaven with the chaste bridegroom, the Savior Christ who lives and rixað mid his heofenlican fæder. and þam halgum gaste. on	and reigns with his heavenly Father and the Holy Ghost, ealra worulda woruld. Amen;	for ever and ever. Amen.

Bibliography

- Aland, Kurt, ed. Synopsis Quattor Evangeliorum. 13th revised edition. Stuttgart: Deutsch Bibelgesellschaft, 1985.
- Anderson, Rachel S. "Saint's Legends." Pages 87-105 in A History of Old English Literature. Edited by R. D. Fulk and Christopher M. Cain. Maldon, Mass.: Blackwell, 2005.
- Andrieu, Michel, ed. Les Ordines romani du haut moyen âge. 5 Vols. Spicilegium Sacrum Lovaniense 11, 23, 24, 28, 29. Louvain, 1931-1961.
- Assmann, Bruno. Angelsächsische Homilien und Heiligenleben. Bib. ags. Prosa 3. Kassel: G. H. Wigand, 1889; repr. with intro. by P. Clemoes Darmstadt 1964.
- Augustine, On Christian Doctrine. Translated by D. W. Robertson, Jr. Upper Saddle River, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1958.
- Baird, William. The History of New Testament Research: Volume One: From Deism to Tübingen. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992.
- Barré, H. Les homéliares carolingiens de l'école d'Auxerre. Studi e Testi 225. Rome: Biblioteca apostolica vaticana 1962.
- Bately, Janet. "The Nature of Old English Prose." Pages 71-87 in The Cambridge Companion to Old English Literature. Edited by Malcolm Godden and Michael Lapidge. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- Bede the Venerable. Homilies on the Gospels: Book One: Advent to Lent. Translated by Lawrence T. Martin and David Hurst. Cistercian Studies 110. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1991.
- Blount, Brian K. Cultural Interpretation: Reorienting New Testament Criticism. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995.
- Boring, M. Eugene. "Matthew." Pages 87-506 in The New Interpreter's Bible: Matthew-Mark, ed. Leander E. Keck. Vol. 8. Nashville: Abingdon, 1995.
- Cameron, Angus. "A List of Old English Texts." Pages 25-306 in A Plan for the Dictionary of Old English. Edited by Roberta Frank and Angus Cameron. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1973.
- Cassian, John. The Institutes. Translated by Boniface Ramsey. Ancient Christian Writers 58; N.Y., N.Y.: Newman, 2000.
- Clayton, Mary. "Homiliaries and Preaching in Anglo-Saxon England." Peritia 4 (1985): 207-42.
- Clemoes, Peter A.M. "Late Old English Literature." Pages 103-114 in *Tenth Century Studies:*Essays in Commemoration of the Millennium of the Council of Winchester and the Regularis Concordia. Edited by David Parsons. London: Phillimore, 1975.
- ——. Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The First Series, Text. Early English Text Society, supplementary series 17. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Clover, Carol J. "The Germanic Context of the Unferb Episode." Speculum 55 (1980): 444-68. Reprinted as pages 127-154 in The Beomulf Reader. Edited by Peter S. Baker. N.Y., N.Y.: Garland, 2000.
- Colgrave, Betram, ed. and trans. The Earliest Life of Gregory the Great. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1968.
- Crawford, Samuel J. Exameron Anglice or The Old English Hexameron. Bib. ags. Prosa 10. Hamburg: H. Grand, 1921 [repr. Darmstadt 1968].
- ——. The Old English Version of the Heptateuch. Early English Text Society 160. London: Oxford University Press, 1922; repr. with additions by N.R. Ker 1969.

- Davies, Oliver. Celtic Spirituality. Classics of Western Spirituality. N.Y., N.Y.: Paulist, 1999.
- Davies, W. D. and Dale C. Allison. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Gospel According to Saint Matthew. 3 vols. International Critical Commentary 26. London/New York: T&T Clark International, 2004.
- Davis, Ellen F. and Richard B. Hayes, "Learning to Read the Scriptures Again," The Christian Century (April 20, 2004).
- ———, eds., The Art of Reading Scripture. Grand Rapids, Mich: William B. Eerdmans, 2003.
- Day, Virginia. "The influence of the catechetical narratio on Old English and some other medieval literature." Anglo-Saxon England 3 (1974): 51-61.
- de Lubac, Henri. Medieval Exegesis: The Four Senses of Scripture. Translated by Mark Sebanc. 4 vols. Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998-forthcoming.
- Dibelius, Martin. The Sermon on the Mount. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1940.
- Elliott, J. K. ed. The Apocryphal New Testament. Oxford: Clarendon, 1993.
- Epp, Eldon J. and George W. MacRae, S.J., eds. The New Testament and Its Modern Interpreters. Atlanta, GA: Scholars Press, 1989.
- Fehr, Bernhard. Die Hirtenbriefe. In altenglischer und lateinischer Fassung. Reprint; Darmstadt : Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1966 [1914].
- Feine, Paul, Johannes Behm, and Werner G. Kümmel, Introduction to the New Testament. Translated by A. J. Mattill, Jr.; 14th Rev. ed. Nashville: Abingdon, 1966.
- Fish, Stanley E. *Is There a Text in This Class?: The Authority of Interpretive Communities.*Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1980.
- Flynn, William T. Medieval Music as Medieval Exegesis. Lanham, Md.: Scarecrow, 1999.
- Förster, Max. "Über die Quellen von Ælfric's exegetischen Homiliae Catholicae." Anglia 16 (1894), 1-61.
- Fry, Timothy et al., eds. RB 1980: The Rule of Saint Benedict in Latin and English with Notes. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Training, 1981.
- Fulk, R. D. and Christopher M. Cain, A History of Old English Literature (Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2005)
- Gatch, Milton McC. Preaching and Theology in Anglo-Saxon England: Ælfric and Wulfstan. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1977.
- Gneuss, Helmut. "Liturgical books in Anglo-Saxon England and their Old English terminology." Pages 91-141 in Learning and literature in Anglo-Saxon England: studies presented to Peter Clemoes on the occasion of his sixty-fifth birthday. Edited by Michael Lapidge and Helmut Gneuss. Cambridge; New York: Cambridge University Press, 1985.
- Godden, Malcolm. Aelfric's Catholic Homilies: Introduction, Commentary and Glossary. Early English Text Society, supplementary series, 18. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2000.
- ——. Ælfric's Catholic Homilies: The Second Series, Text. Early English Text Society, supplementary series 5. London: Oxford University Press, 1979.
- Grant, Robert M. with David Tracy. A Short History of the Interpretation of the Bible. 2d ed. Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984.
- Green, Joel B., ed. Hearing the New Testament: Strategies for Interpretation. Grand Rapids, Mich: Wm. B. Eerdmans, 1995.
- Grégoire, Reginald. Homéliaires liturgiques médiévaux: analyse des manuscrits. Bibl degli studi medievali 12. Spoleto, 1980.
- Les homéliaires du moyen âge. Rerum Ecclesiasticarum Documenta, Series Maior, Fontes 6. Rome, 1966
- Gregory I. Forty Gospel Homilies. Translated by David Hurst. Cistercian Studies 123. Kalamazoo, Mich.: Cistercian Publications, 1990.

- Hall, Thomas N. "Ælfric and the Epistle to the Laodicians." Pages 65-84 in Apocryphal Texts and Traditions in Anglo-Saxon England. Edited by Kathryn Powell and Donald Scragg. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer, 2003.
- Hare, Douglas. Matthew. Interpretation. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995.
- Harper, John. The Forms and Orders of Western Liturgy from the Tenth to the Eighteenth Century: A Historical Introduction and Guide for Students and Musicians. Oxford: Clarendon, 1991.
- Hayes, John H. and Carl R. Holladay. Biblical Exegesis: A Beginner's Handbook. Revised ed. Atlanta, GA: John Knox, 1987.
- ——. Biblical Exegesis: A Beginner's Handbook. 2nd ed. Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2007.
- Hesbert, René-Jean. Corpus Antiphonalium Officii. 6 vols. Rome: Herder, 1963ff.
- Hill, Joyce. "Ælfric and Smaragdus.", Anglo-Saxon England 21 (1992): 203-237
- Hill, Thomas D. "Literary History and Old English Poetry: The Case of Christ I, II, III," Pages 3-22 in Sources of Anglo-Saxon Culture. Edited by Paul E. Szarmach. Studies in Medieval Culture 20. Kalamazoo, Mich.: The Medieval Institute, 1986.
- Hughes, Anselm. The Portiforium of Saint Wulstan (Corpus Christi College Cambridge ms. 391). Henry Bradshaw Society 89. London: Henry Bradshaw Society, 1958.
- Johnson, D. W. "Pelagius." Pages 255-6 in vol. 2 of The Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation. Edited by John H. Hayes. Nashville: Abingdon, 1999
- Johnson, Luke T. and William S. Kurz, The Future of Catholic Biblical Scholarship: A Constructive Conversation. Grand Rapids, Mich.: Eerdmans, 2002.
- Jolly, Karen. Popular Religion in Late Saxon England: Elf Charms in Context. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Jones, Christopher A. Ælfric's Letter to the Monks at Eynsham. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Kissinger, W. S. "Sermon on the Mount." Pages 462-466 in volume 2 of the Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation. Edited by John H. Hayes. 2 vols. Nashville: Abingdon, 1999.
- Kloppenborg, John S. The Formation of Q: Trajectories in Ancient Wisdom Collections. Harrisburg, Penn.: Trinity, 1999 [1987].
- Knowles, David. The Monastic Order in England. Oxford: Clarendon, 1968.
- Kümmel, Werner G. The New Testament: The History of the Investigation of its Problems. Translated by S. McLean Gilmour and Howard C. Kee. Nashville: Abingdon, 1972.
- Lapidge, Michael. "The saintly life in Anglo-Saxon England." Pages 243-263 in The Cambridge Companion to Old English Literature. Edited by Malcolm Godden and Michael Lapidge. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986.
- ———. The Anglo-Saxon Library. Oxford: Oxford University, 2008.
- Leclercq, Jean. The Love of Learning and the Desire for God: A Study of Monastic Culture. Translated by Catharine Misrahi, New York: Fordham University Press, 1982.
- Lenker, Ursula. Die westsächsische Evangelienversion und die Perikopenordnungen im angelsächsiscen England. Munich: Fink, 1997.
- Letson, D.R. "The Poetic Content of the Revival Homily." Pages 139-56 in The Old English Homily & its Backgrounds. Edited by Paul E. Szarmach and Bernard F. Huppé. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1978.
- Livingstone, Elizabeth A., ed. The Concise Oxford Dictionary of the Christian Church. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- Luz, Ulrich Matthew 8-20: A Commentary on the Gospel of Matthew. Translated by James E. Crouch. Hermeneia. Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001.

- ——. Matthew 1-7: A Continental Commentary. Translated by Wilhelm C. Linss. Hermeneia. Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992.
- ——. Matthew 21-28. Translated by James E. Crouch. Hermeneia. Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005.
- McKenzie, Steven L. and Stephen R. Haynes, eds. To Each Its Own Meaning: Biblical Criticisms and their Applications. Revised ed. Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999.
- Millful, Inge B. Hymns of the Anglo-Saxon Church. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
- Nokes, Richard S. and Kathryn Laity, eds. Curing Elf-shot and Other Mysterious Maladies: New Scholarship on Old English Charms. University Park, Penn.: Penn State University Press, 2009.
- Orchard, Nicholas, ed., The Leofric Missal. 2 vols. Henry Bradshaw Society 113 & 114. Rochester, N.Y.: Boydell, 2002.
- Patrologia Latina. Edited by Jean-Paul Migne. 217 vols. Paris, 1844-1864.
- Peifer, Claude. "The Rule in History." Pages 113-151 in RB 1980: The Rule of St. Benedict in English and Latin with Notes. Edited by Timothy Fry, et al. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1980.
- ——. "The Rule of St. Benedict." Pages 65-112 in RB 1980: The Rule of St. Benedict in English and Latin with Notes. Edited by Timothy Fry, et al. Collegeville, Minn.: Liturgical Press, 1980.
- Pope, John C. Homilies of Ælfric: A Supplementary Collection. 2 vols. Early English Text Society 259, 260. London: Oxford University Press, 1967-8.
- Ramsey, Boniface, ed. John Cassian: The Conferences. Ancient Christian Writers 57. Mahwah, N.J.: Paulist, 1997.
- Skeat, Walter W. Ælfric's Lives of Saints, 4 vols. Early English Text Society 76, 82, 94, 114. London: Oxford University Press, 1881-1900 [repr. in 2 vols. 1966].
- Smalley, Beryl. Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages. 3d ed. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press, 1964.
- Smetana, Cyri.l "Ælfric and the Homiliary of Haymo of Halberstadt." Traditio 17 (1961): 457-69.
- . "Ælfric and the Early Medieval Homiliary." Traditio 15 (1959): 163-204.
- ———. "Paul the Deacon's Patristic Anthology." Pages 75-97 in The Old English Homily & its Backgrounds. Edited by Paul E. Szarmach and Bernard F. Huppé. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1978.
- Stanton, Graham N. "Matthew, Gospel of." Pages 136-141 in volume 2 of the Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation. Edited by John H. Hayes. 2 vols. Nashville: Abingdon, 1999.
- Steinmetz, David C. "The Superiority of Pre-Modern Exegesis." Theology Today 37 (1980): 1, 27-38.
- Strebinger, Jean Anne, trans., "Homily XV." Pages 98-103 in The Vercelli Book Homilies. Edited by Paul Szarmach. Toronto Old English Series, 5. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1981.
- Swain, Larry. "Ælfric of Eynsham's Letter to Sigeweard: An Edition, Commentary, and Translation." Ph.D. diss. University of Chicago, 2008.
- Symons, Thomas. Regularis Concordia Anglicae Nationis Monachorum Sanctimonialiumque. The Monastic Agreement of the Monks and Nuns of the English Nation. London: Nelson, 1953.
- Szarmach, Paul E. "Ælfric as Exegete: Approaches and Examples in the Study of the Sermones Catholici," Pages 237-47 in Hermeneutics and Medieval Culture. Edited by H. Damico and P. Gallacher. Albany, N.Y.: SUNY Press, 1989.

- ——. "Anglo-Saxon Letters in the Eleventh Century." Pages 1-14 in The Eleventh Century. Edited by Stanley Ferber and Sandro Sticca. Acta 1. Binghamton, NY: CEMERS, 1974.
- Szarmach, Paul E. and Bernard F. Huppé, eds. The Old English Homily & its Backgrounds. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press, 1978.
- The Book of Common Prayer. New York: Church Publishing, 1979.
- The Sayings of the Desert Fathers: The Alphabetical Collection. Translated by Benedicta Ward. Cistercian Studies 59. Revised ed. Kalamazoo: Cistercian, 1984.
- Vogel, Cyrille. Medieval Liturgy: An Introduction to the Sources. Translated and revised by William Storey and Niels Rasmussen. Portland: Pastoral, 1986.
- Wilcox, Jonathan. Ælfric's Prefaces. Durham Medieval Texts 9. Durham: University of Durham, 1995.